

THE CENTURY DICTIONARY

PUBLISHERS' NOTE TO THE EDITION OF 1899.

SINCE The Century Dictionary was completed, in 1891, several editions have been issued, each of which has embodied the results of a careful revision of the text. Defects which have been detected have been remedied, statistical matter has been brought down to date, and important new words have been inserted; though it has not been found necessary to modify in any essential particular the plan or the substance of the work. The present edition, which comprises all the changes and additions thus made, has also been revised with the same care, and will be found to be abreast of the times. Having been originally published in the United States, the American spelling has been preserved.

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
 ă as in fate, make, dale.
 ĩ as in far, father, guard.
 ʌ as in fall, talk, naught.
 ʊ as in ask, fast, ant.
 ũ as in fare, hair, bear.

e as in met, pen, bless.
 ē as in mete, meet, meat.
 ɛ as in her, fern, heard.

i as in pin, it, biscuit.
 ĭ as in pine, light, die.

o as in not, on, frog.
 ɔ as in note, poke, floor.
 ɒ as in move, spoon, room.
 ɔ̃ as in nor, song, off.

u as in tub, son, blood.
 ŭ as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty; see Preface, pp. ix, x).
 ũ as in pull, book, could.
 ũ German ũ, French u.

oi as in oil, joint, boy.
 ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

ȳ as in prelate, courage, captain.
 ȅ as in ablegate, episcopal.
 ȝ as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
 ȝ as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.). See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

ȳ as in errant, republican.
 ȅ as in prudent, difference.
 ȝ as in charity, density.
 ȝ as in valor, actor, idiot.

ĭ as in Persia, peninsula.
 ĕ as in the book.
 ŭ as in nature, feature.

A mark (˘) under the consonants t, d, s, c indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh. Thus:

˘t as in nature, adventure.
 ˘d as in arduous, education.
 ˘s as in pressure.
 ˘c as in seizure.

th as in thin.
 ʒh as in then.
 ʃh as in German sch, Scotch loch.
 ñ French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.
 ly (in French words) French liquid (mouillé) l.
 ' denotes a primary, ˘ a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

SIGNS.

< read from; i. e., derived from.
 > read whence; i. e., from which is derived.
 + read and; i. e., compounded with, or with suffix.
 = read cognate with; i. e., etymologically parallel with.

✓ read root.
 * read theoretical or alleged; i. e., theoretically assumed, or asserted but unverified, form.
 † read obsolete.

SPECIAL EXPLANATIONS.

A superior figure placed after a title-word indicates that the word so marked is distinct etymologically from other words, following or preceding it, spelled in the same manner and marked with different numbers. Thus:

back¹ (bak), n. The posterior part, etc.
 back¹ (bak), a. Lying or being behind, etc.
 back¹ (bak), v. To furnish with a back, etc.
 back¹ (bak), adv. Behind, etc.
 back² (bak), n. The earlier form of *bat*².
 back³ (bak), n. A large flat-bottomed boat, etc.

Various abbreviations have been used in the credits to the quotations, as "No." for number, "st." for stanza, "p." for page, "l." for line, ¶ for paragraph, "fol." for folio. The method used in indicating the subdivisions of books will be understood by reference to the following plan:

Section only § 5.
 Chapter only xiv.
 Canto only xiv.
 Book only iii.

Book and chapter }
 Part and chapter }
 Book and line }
 Book and page }
 Act and scene }
 Chapter and verse }
 No. and page }
 Volume and page II. 34.
 Volume and chapter IV. iv.
 Part, book, and chapter II. iv. 12.
 Part, canto, and stanza II. iv. 12.
 Chapter and section or ¶ vii. § 12 § 3.
 Volume, part, and section or § 1 i. § or § 6.
 Book, chapter, and section or ¶ 1 i. § or § 6.

Different grammatical phases of the same word are grouped under one head, and distinguished by the Roman numerals I., II., III., etc. This applies to transitive and intransitive uses of the same verb, to adjectives used also as nouns, to n-uns used also as adjectives, to adverbs used also as prepositions or conjunctions, etc.

The capitalizing and italicizing of certain or all of the words in a synonym-list indicates that the words so distinguished are discriminated in the text immediately following, or under the title referred to.

The figures by which the synonym-lists are sometimes divided indicate the senses or definitions with which they are connected.

The title-words begin with a small (lower-case) letter, or with a capital, according to usage. When usage differs, in this matter, with the different senses of a word, the abbreviations [cap.] for "capital" and [l. c.] for "lower-case" are used to indicate this variation.

The difference observed in regard to the capitalizing of the second element in zoological and botanical terms is in accordance with the existing usage in the two sciences. Thus, in zoology, in a scientific name consisting of two words the second of which is derived from a proper name, only the first would be capitalized. But a name of similar derivation in botany would have the second element also capitalized.

The names of zoological and botanical classes, orders, families, genera, etc., have been uniformly italicized, in accordance with the present usage of scientific writers.

macaque, M. maurus the tail is a mere stump. Some of these monkeys reach the snow-line in Tibet, as M. thibetanus. A remarkable species, the wanderoo, M. ellensis, with a tufted tail and the ears set in an enormous frill of long gray hair, inhabits Malabar. Sometimes spelled macake.

Macaria (mā-kā'ri-ā), n. [N.L., < Gr. μακάριος, makariōs, blessed, happy.] In zoöl., a name of various genera. (a) A genus of spiders, Koch, 1796. (b) The typical genus of Macaridæ or Macarionæ, erected by Curtis in 1829. They are delicate, slender-bodied moths of grayish color, whose larvae are slender with heart-shaped head. It is a large and wide-spread genus, occurring abundantly in Europe and America. M. liturata is the twenty-barred angle of English collectors, to whom M. notata is known as the small peacock-moth. (c) A genus of ladybirds or coccinellids, confined to South America, having the third and fifth joints of the antennæ very small. Also Macaria, Dejean, 1834.

Macarian (mā-kā'ri-an), a. [Macarius (see def.)] < Gr. μακάριος, blessed] + -an.] 1. A follower of the monastic system or customs of the older Macarius of Egypt, or of the younger Macarius of Alexandria, contemporary monks of the fourth century, who were noted for their severe asceticism. 2. A follower of the Monothelite Macarius, patriarch of Antioch in the seventh century.

Macaridæ (mā-kā'ri-dē), n. pl. [N.L., < Macaria + -idæ.] A family of geometrid moths, typified by the genus Macaria. Also called Macaridæ. They are also classed as a subfamily, Macarina, of Geometridæ.

macarism (mak'ā-riz-m), n. [Gr. μακάριος, blessed, < μακάριος, blessed.] A benediction. J. I. Alexander, Commentary on Matthew, p. 110.

macarize (mak'ā-riz), v. t.; pret. and pp. macarized, macarizing. [Gr. μακάριος, blessed, pronounce happy, < μακάριος, blessed, happy.] To bless; pronounce happy; wish joy to; congratulate. [Rare.]

The word macaria has been adopted by Oxford men who are familiar with Aristotle, to supply a word wanting in our language. "Felicitate" and "congratulate" are (in actual usage) confined to events. . . . It may be said that men are admitted for what they are, commended for what they do, and macarized for what they have.

Whately, On Bacon's Essay on Poisons (ed. 1855).

macaroni (mak'ā-rō-ni), n. and a. [Formerly also macaron, macaroni, macaron; = Macaroni = Sp. macaroni = Fr. macaroni, < It. macaroni, It. maccheroni, macaron, orig. a mixture of flour, cheese, and butter, prob. < macare, bruise, batter, < L. macere, to macerate; see macerate. Cf. macaron, from the same source.] In ref. to the secondary uses of the word (cf. It. maccherone, now maccherone, a fool, blockhead), it is to be noted that it is common to name a droll fellow, regarded as typical of his country, after some favorite article of food, as Jack-pudding, (A. Hansard) < (Jack Sausage), F. Jean Farine ('Jack Flour').] 1. n. 1. A kind of paste or dough prepared, originally and chiefly in Italy, from the glutinous granular flour of hard varieties of wheat, pressed into long tubes or pipes through the perforated bottom of a vessel furnished with man-drels, and afterward dried in the sun or by low heat. The same material called Italian paste, is also made into a thread-like product called vermicelli, and into sticks, lozenges, disks, ribbons, etc. Macaroni, cooked in various ways, constitutes a leading article of food in Italy, especially in Naples and Genoa, and it is much used elsewhere. Imitations of it are made in other countries from ordinary flour, which is much less suitable.

He doth learn to make strange sauces, to eat anchovies, macaroni, borselli, taglioli, and casheba.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, II. 1.

2. A medley; something extravagant or calculated to please an idle fancy. 3. A London exquisite of the eighteenth century; a fop; a dandy; a member of the Macaroni Club. See II., 1.

Macaroni and Lady in dress of 1780-1795.

Lady Falkener's daughter is to be married to a young rich Mr. Crew, a macarone, and of our lot.

Walpole, To Hertford, May 27, 1764.

You are a delicate Londoner; you are a macarone; you can't ride.

Boncell, Tour to Hebrides, p. 64.

Are never were seen two such beautiful ponies;

Other horses are clowns, but these macaronies.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, II. 2.

[Hence arose the use of the word in the contemporary doggerel of "Yankee Doodle".]

[He] stuck a feather in his cap,

And called it macaroni.

and its application as a name to the American revolution, to a body of Maryland troops remarkable for their showy uniforms.]

4. A crested penguin or rock-hopper; a sailor's name. See penguin, and cut under Eudyptes.

II. a. 1. Consisting of gay or stylish young men; specifically [cap.] applied to a London club, founded about the middle of the eighteenth century, composed of young men who had traveled and sought to introduce elegances of dress and bearing from the continent.

On Saturday, at the Macaroni Club (which is composed of all the travelled young men who wear long curls and spying glasses) they played again.

Walpole, To Hertford, Feb. 6, 1764.

2. Of or pertaining to macaronis or fops; exquisite.

You travelled tribe, ye macaronis tribe,
Of French friars and no-gays justly vain.

Goldsmith, Epilogue spoken by Mrs. Bulkeley and Miss

Clay.

But gawk in macaroni dress,

Are ye come here to show your face?

Ferguson, On seeing a butterfly in the street macaronian (mak'ā-rō-ni-an), a. and n. [Macaroni + -an.] Same as macaronic.

macaronic (mak'ā-rō-nik), a. and n. [= F. macaronique = Sp. macaronico = Fr. macaronico = It. maccheronico, = macaron + -ic.]

1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the food macaroni. 2. a. Pertaining to or like a macaroni or fop; hence, trifling; vain; affected. 3. In lit., using, or characterized by the use of, many strange, distorted, or foreign words or terms, with little regard to syntax, yet with sufficient analogy to common words and constructions to be or seem intelligible; as, a macaronic poem; macaronic verse. Specifically, macaronic verse or poetry is a kind of burlesque verse in which words of another language are interlarded with Latin words, or are made to figure with Latin terminations and in Latin constructions. The term was brought into vogue by the popular satirical works in this style of the Mantuan T. Offic. Belgio (ed. 1544). It is probable that this use of the word has reference to the varied ingredients which enter into the preparation of a dish of macaroni.

A macaronic stage seems very often to mark the decline of an old literature and language, in countries exposed to powerful foreign influences.

H. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., v.

II. n. 1. A confused heap or mixture of several things. Cotgrave. 2. Macaronic verse. macaronical (mak'ā-rō-ni-kal), a. [Macaronic + -al.] Same as macaronic. [Nazhe.]

macaroon (mak'ā-rō-n), n. [Formerly also macaron, macaron, macaron, macaron; < F. macaron, macaron, also a bun or cake, = Sp. macaron, macaron, < It. macaroni, orig. a mixture of flour, cheese, and butter; see macaroni.] 1. A small sweet cake, made of sweet-almond meal instead of wheat flour, and white of eggs.

Let anything come in the shape of fodder, or eating stuff, it is welcome, whether it be Sawdage, . . . or Cheese cake, . . . or Macaron, Kickshaw, or Taintabill!

San Taylor, The Great Easter of Kent (1600).

2. A droll; a buffoon. 3. A finical fellow; a fop; an exquisite. Compare macaroni, 3.

Call him . . . a macaroon.

And no way fit to speak or clouted shoe.

H. B. Pk., on Tommy (Dyce's Poems ed. 1820).

macarte (mā-kā'tē), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A rope attached to the huckamore.

Macartney pheasant. See phasant.

macary-bitter (mak'ā-rī-bī-ter), n. The shrub Pierisoma Antiochia, which yields medicinal bitters. [West Indies.]

Macassar oil. See oil.

macasse (mak'ā-sē), n. [Origin obscure.] In a sugar mill, one of the two side rollers (the other one being called distinctively the side roller) placed in the same horizontal plane beneath the third roller, which is called the king-roller.

macaw (mā-kā'), n. [Formerly also macaw, macaw, < It. macaw, < Port. macaw.] A large American parrot of the family Psittacidae and subfamily Aratinginae or having a very long graduated tail and the face partly bare of feathers. The macaws are among the largest and most magnificent of the parrot tribe, but they are less docile than most parrots, and their voice is exceedingly harsh. The species are numerous, all inhabiting tropical or subtropical America, especially the former.

See Aratinga.

macaw-bush (mā-kā' būsh), n. A West Indian plant, Solanum mammosum, a somewhat shrubby, prickly weed.

macaw-palm (mā-kā'pām), n. Same as stacaw-tree.

macaw-tree (mā-kā'tré), n. A South American palm, Acrocomia sclerocarpia. Also called guayaba.

Maccabean (mak'ā-bē-an), a. [Also Maccabean; < L.L. Maccabæus, < Gr. Μακκαβίος, Maccabæus.] Of or pertaining to the Jewish princes called Maccabees, who delivered Judea from the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes, about 166 B. C., and rendered it independent for about a century.

maccaronit, n. and a. An obsolete form of macaroni.

maccaw, n. An old spelling of macaw.

Macchiavellian, a. and n. See Macchiavellian.

macco (mak'ō), n. [It. macca, massacre, slaughter (also bean porridge).] A gambling game.

His uncle was still at the macco table.

T. Hook, Man of Many Friends. (Davies.)

maccoboy (mak'ō-boy), n. A corruption of macco, in common use.

maccouba, macouba (mak'ō-bā), n. [So named from Macouba, a place in Martinique where the tobacco from which the snuff was originally made is grown.] A kind of fine dark-brown snuff, usually scented. More commonly maccoboy.

McCulloch Act. See act.

mace (mās), n. [ME. mace, masse, mas, < OF. mace, mache (also macque, maque, maki), < F. masse = Fr. masse = Sp. masa = It. masa (Ml. reflex masa), a club, septer, < L.L. matut, L. matut, found only in dim. matula, a mallet or beetle. Cf. mack.] 1. A weapon for striking, consisting of a heavy head, commonly of metal, with a handle or staff, usually of such length as to be conveniently wielded with one hand; by extension, any similar weapon. The head is often spiked, and sometimes consists of six, eight, or more radiating blades, grouped around a central spike, all of steel.

Arm'd with their greaves, and maces, and broad swords.

Hayward, Fr. Fr. Penitents.

They were divided into large parties, and meeting together combatted with clubs or maces, beating each other soundly.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 392.

2. A scepter; a staff of office having somewhat the form of the weapon of war defined above. Maces are borne before or by officials of various ranks in many countries, as a symbol of authority or badge of office. The mace on the table of the British House of Lords or House of Commons represents the authority of the House.

passage, or in the floor of a projecting gallery, made for the purpose of hurling missiles, or pouring down molten lead, hot pitch, etc., upon an enemy desirous to enter or mine. In the gallery type machicolations are formed by setting out the parapet or bastionment, if supported on corbels beyond the face of the wall, & spaces between the corbels are left open and constitute the machicolations. (See cut on following page.) Machicolations of permanent construction in stone were not introduced until toward the end of the twelfth century. But in the handling of wood with which walls and towers were crowned in times of need from the earliest period of the middle ages, their use was constant.

2. The act of hurling missiles or of pouring burning liquids upon an enemy through apertures such as those described above.—3. By extension, a machicolated parapet or gallery or a projection supported on corbels in imitation of the above.

band, some take the name of the fish to be due to mackerel in this sense: see mackerel¹.] A pander or pimp.

Sybbe his house dwelled a mackerel or backe.
Caxton, The Magna (1475). (Halliwell.)

mackerel-bait (mak'e-rel-bat), n. Jellyfish, a favorite prey of the mackerel: so called by Chesapeake fishermen.

mackerel-boat (mak'e-rel-bot), n. A strong clincher-built craft, having a large fore-and-aft spritsail, and jigger, used in fishing for mackerel.

mackerel-bob (mak'e-rel-bob), n. A kind of bob used in catching mackerel when they are close to the vessel and in large schools.

mackerel-cock (mak'e-rel-kok), n. The Manx shearwater, Puffinus anglicus: so called from its connection with the mackerel fisheries. [Lambay Island.]

mackereler, mackereller (mak'e-rel-er), n. One who fishes for mackerel, or a boat engaged in fishing for mackerel.

mackerel-gaff (mak'e-rel-gaf), n. See gaff¹.

mackerel-guide (mak'e-rel-gud), n. A local English name of the gullfish, Belone vulgaris, from the fact that it comes toward the shore a little before the appearance of mackerel. Day.

mackerel-gull (mak'e-rel-gul), n. A common name in the United States of terns or sea-swallow, from the forked tail. Such species as Sterna hirundo, S. forsteri, S. macrura, etc., are known by this name.

mackereller, v. See mackereler.

mackerel-midge (mak'e-rel-mij), n. The young of the rocklings, guloid fishes of the genus Mobilia or of thous. [Prov. Eng.]

mackerel-mint (mak'e-rel-mint), n. Spear-mint, Monarda canad.

mackerel-pike (mak'e-rel-pike), n. Any fish of the family Scorpaenidae: generally called snury.

mackerel-plow (mak'e-rel-plou), n. A knife used for crusting the sides of lean mackerel to make them resemble fish of the first quality. Also called fattening-knife.

mackerel-sad (mak'e-rel-sad), n. A caran gold fish of the genus Deapterus, as D. maculatus, of a silvery color, plumbeous below, with a black spot on the opercle and nearly straight lateral line, inhabiting warm parts of the Atlantic and northward to New England.

mackerel-scales (mak'e-rel-skals), n. pl. A form of cirro-cumulus cloud in which the cloudlets are without any fleecy texture and somewhat angular in form.

mackerel-scott, n. Same as mackerel-guide.

mackerel-shark (mak'e-rel-shark), n. One of several kinds of sharks, as Lamna ditropis, or the Mackerel-shark, or Porbeagle, Lamna cornubica.

porbeagle, Lamna cornubica. They have a forked tail like a mackerel, attain a length of 10 feet, and annoy fishermen by biting off their lines. See porbeagle.

mackerel-sky (mak'e-rel-ski), n. A sky in which the clouds have the form called cirro-cumulus—that is, are broken into fleecy masses three, four, or more times as long as they are wide, and arranged in parallel groups. Also called mackerel-back sky.

mackerly (mak'e-rel-i), n. [Of mackerel-sh.] Shapely; fashionable. [Prov. Eng.]

mackeronit, n. An obsolete spelling of mackeron.

mackin, mackins (mak'in, mak), n. [A short form of Marykin (cf. ladyskin for ladykin), referring to the Virgin Mary. Cf. Mary.] A word used in the old popular myth by the mackins, by our Lady.

I would not have my name Dick one of those boats for the best pig in my sty, by the mackins.
Randolph, Muses Looking Glass, iv. 4.

Mackinaw blanket. [So called from Mackinac, an abbreviated form of Michilimackinac, the name of an island in the strait connecting Lakes Michigan and Huron, said to mean in Ojibway 'turtle,' in allusion to its shape.] A name given to the blankets distributed to the Indians of the Northwest by the United States Government. The name is or was formerly current chiefly on the upper Great Lakes, and owes its origin to the fact that Fort Mackinaw was for many years the most remote post in the Northwest, so that from this point a large number of Indians received their supplies. Mackinaw blankets were of various sizes, colors and qualities.

Mackinaw boat. A flat-bottomed, flat-sided boat with sharp prow and square stern, used on the upper Great Lakes and the rivers emptying into them. The advantage of the Mackinaw boat over the birch canoe is that its beam stays rougher hand long, and that it can be drawn up on the beach without being unloaded, the disadvantage is that it is too heavy to be carried over portages, as the birch canoe is carried. The largest Mackinaw boats are rowed by four or more persons, and are often rigged with a sail.

Mackinaw trout. See trout.

mackinist, n. See mackin.

mackintosh (mak'in-tosh), n. [Also macintosh; so named from Charles Mackintosh, the inventor.] 1. A garment, particularly an overcoat or cloak, rendered water-proof by a solution of India-rubber, either applied on the surface as a coating or placed between two thicknesses of some cloth of suitable texture. 2. Rubber cloth of the kind used in making a mackintosh.

The bad is covered with a mackintosh sheet.

Linn., See 1476, p. 880.

mackish (mak'ish), a. [Origin uncertain; cf. mackerly.] Smart. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

mackle (mak'l), n. [Early mod. E. macell; < F. macle, a spot; see macule, macule.] A spot; specifically, in printing, a blemish in press-work made by a double impression, or by slipping or scraping, or by a wrinkle in the paper. Also macle, macule.

mackle (mak'l), v. t. pret. and pp. mackled, pp. macking. [< F. maculer = Pr. Sp. Pg. macular = It. maculare, < L. maculare, spot, stain; see the noun.] To spot; maculate; blur; especially, in printing, to make a slipped, blurred, or double impression of. Also macule.

macklin (mak'in), n. Short for Macklin lace.

Macklin lace. See lace.

mackinnny (mak'in-i), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A kind of puppet-show.

He could not present emblematically the downfall of majesty as in his career show and mackinnny.
Hyper North, Examiner, p. 126. (Dance.)

macle (mak'l), n. [< OF. macle, macule, F. macule = Sp. macula = Pg. macula = It. macula, macula, < L. macula, a spot, stain. Cf. macula, macule, macule, macule, macule, from the same source.] 1. Same as mackle—2. In mineral. (a) A kind of twin crystal. See tern. (b) Chastolite, cross-stone, or hollow spar, a variety of andalusite, the crystals of which have the axis and angles colored differently from the remainder. See chastolite. (c) A twinned appearance in other crystals.—3. In her., same as macule, 3.

Macleayan (mak-lā'an), n. [< Macleay (see def.) + -an.] Pertaining to the Scotch naturalist Macleay. Macleayan system, a system of classification proposed by Mr. Macleay. Also called the quaternary system. See quaternary.

macled (mak'led), a. [< macle + -ed.] 1. In mineral, twinned.—2. Spotted; more or less regularly marked, like a crystal of chastolite.

macloé, n. [F. macle, macule.] Same as macled.

McLeod case. See case¹.

MacLure (mak'lū'r), n. [NL. (Nuttall, 1818), named after W. MacLure; see MacLure.] 1. A genus of plants of the order Cruciferae, the nettle family, the tribe Morae, and the subtribe Broussonetieae, thus closely related to the mulberry. It is characterized by the pistillate flowers having a four-parted perianth and growing in quite large heads and the staminate flowers in short, loose racemes. The fruit is multiple, composed of many small achenes packed closely together upon a globose, rather fleshy receptacle, resembling a warty greenorange. There is but a single species, M. acuminata, the orange orange, a native of Arkansas and adjacent regions in the United States. It is a spreading tree with handsome shining ovate leaves, from 20 to 60 feet in height and 2 feet or less in diameter. Its wood is hard, strong, and flexible, of a satiny texture, the heart-wood bright orange turning brown, the sap-wood lighter. It was formerly used by the Indians for house-bence called by the French netilles house-bence (how-sen), corrupted into netilles or netilles. It bears cutting back and has formidable thorns and hence is very extensively used in the United States for hedges. See cut in next column. 2. In conch., same as MacLure. Ebener Enmons, 1843.

macLureite (mak-lū'r-it), n. [< MacLure (see MacLure) + -ite.] 1. A variety of aluminous pyroxene found at Wilmington, Delaware.—2. A synonym of chondrodite.—3. A fossil shell of the genus MacLure. Also macLureite.

MacLureite (mak-lū'r-it), n. [NL. (Menke, 1800). F. MacLure—Lessner, 1818], so called from William MacLure, a noted geologist (1763-

Branch of Orange (Citrus aurantium) with male and female flowers. a, a male flower; b, a female flower; c, a female flower bud open; d, a leaf, showing the nettle.

1840.] The typical genus of the family MacLureidae. Also MacLurea, MacLureia, MacLurina.

MacLuridae (mak-lū'r-it-ide), n. pl. [NL. < MacLure + -idae.] A family of extinct mollusks, of uncertain relationship, but generally referred to the Rhipidoglossa.

The shell is discoidal, paucispiral and with the apical sunk in an umbilical cavity. The operculum is subapical and furnished with two internal projections, of which one beneath the nucleus, is very thick and rugose. By Woodward the constituent genus was referred to the heteropod family Atlantida; by Tryon, as type of a family, to the acanthopneustate gastropods, between the Isotrochontidae and Halitidae; by others to the family Salicidae, etc. Thirteen species have been recognized in the Paleocene formations from the Lower Miocene to the Carboniferous. Also MacLurea, MacLureidae, MacLuridae.

Macmillanite (mak-mil'an-it), n. [< Macmillan (see def.) + -ite.] A member of the Scotch sect of Cameronians; so called after the Rev. John Macmillan, their first ordained clergyman. See Cameronian, 1.

Macont, n. A variant of Mahound, Mahoun.

maconite (mak'kon-it), n. [< Macon (see def.) + -ite.] A kind of vermiculite found near Franklin in Macon county, North Carolina.

maconné (mas-on-é), n. [F., pp. of maconner, mason; see mason, v.] In her., divided with lines representing the divisions between blocks of stone; said especially of a house or castle used as a bearing. Also maconned.

macouba, n. See macrouba.

Macquartia (mak-war'ti-ā), n. [NL. (Robinson-Desvoidy, 1830), named after P. J. M. Macquart (1778-1855), a French entomologist.] A genus of flies of the family Tachinidae, or giving name to the family Macquartiidae. They are of medium and large size, slender, thickly hairy, usually black, often metallic, and are found near streams on the under side of leaves.

macramé (mak-ra-mé), n. [It. macramé, said to be of Ar. origin.] An ornamental trimming made by leaving a long fringe of thread and knotting the threads together so as to form geometrical patterns. Also called knotted-work.—Macramé cord, a kind of silk cord prepared for the manufacture of macramé lace, and also used for other work, such as netting of various kinds, and for hammocks.—Macramé lace, a kind of knotted-work in which elaborate fringes and the like are made in modern imitation of the old knotted point.

macrandrous (mak-ran'drus), a. [(< Gr. long (see macro), + erps (drop), while (off to a stamen).] Having elongated male plants, as certain algae, particularly the Edogoniaceae.

Macroductyla (mak-ro-duk'ti-lä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of macroductylus = macroductyl] In Latreille's system the second tribe of the second section of Clavicornia, having simple narrow tibiae and long two-pointed tarsi the last joint of which is large with two strong hooks. Also Macroductyl.

Macroductyl (mak-ro-duk'ti-lä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of macroductylus = macroductyl] 1. Same as Macroductyla. 2. In Cuvier's system a group of Grallia or wading birds including the jacquins, horned cranes, and mound bird, with the rails, cranes, coots and gallinules. It is a heterogeneous group, no longer in use.

macroductylic (mak-ro-duk'ti-lä), a. [As macroductyl + y] Same as macroductyl.

Macroductylidae (mak-ro-duk'ti-lä), n. pl. [NL., < Macroductylus + -idae] A family of Coleoptera, named in 1837 by Kirby from the genus Macroductylus, now generally merged in Scutigeridae.

macroductylous (mak-ro-duk'ti-lus), a. [NL., macroductylus, long footed = macroductyl] Same as macroductyl.

Macroductylus (mak-ro-duk'ti-lus), n. [NL., (Latreille, 1825) = macroductyl] A genus of lamellicorn beetles the type of the family Macroductylidae. It comprises rather small species of general form and variable colors with slender legs and the basal claws split at the tip. Of its more than 30 species, 1 are North American of which M. apicatus is the most common. It is very destructive to roses and many fruits of the family Rubaceae. It is about one third of an inch long, of a yellowish color with long brown legs and appears suddenly in June in immense numbers.

macrodiagonal (mak-ro-di-ä-gö-näl), a. and n. [Gr. makros, long, + diagonalis, diagonal = diagonal] 1. a. Constituting or being the longer diagonal of a rhombic prism; pertaining to the macrodiagonal. Macrodiagonal axis, in crystal, the longer lateral axis in an orthorhombic crystal. Macrodiagonal section, a plane passing through the macrodiagonal and vertical axes of a crystal.

II. n. The longer of the diagonals of a rhombic prism.

macrodomatic (mak-ro-do-mät-ik), a. [As macrodomus + -atic] Of or pertaining to a macrodomus.

macrodomus (mak-ro-dom), n. [Gr. makros, long, + domos, a house, domus = domus] In crystal, a dome parallel to the macrodiagonal axis of an orthorhombic crystal. See domus.

macrodon (mak-ro-dön), n. [Gr. makros, long, + odon (odon) = tooth] Having large teeth.

macrodontism (mak-ro-dön-tizm), n. [As macrodon + -ism] A form of dentition in which the teeth are large.

Macroglossa (mak-ro-glos-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + glossa, the tongue = see glossa] 1. A genus of hawk moths of the family Sesiidae, having a short abdomen with a large bunch of hair at the tip like a bird's tail. The wings are short, often opaque and sometimes glassy. Scarcely 100 species are known; they fly by day and with great swiftness. M. stellatus is known as the Hummingbird hawk moth (which see under hawk moth). 2. Same as Macroglossa.

macroglossate (mak-ro-glos-ät), a. [As Macroglossa + -ate] Having a long tongue.

Macroglossi (mak-ro-glos-i), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Macroglossus, q. s.] A division of Pteropoda, or fruit bats, having an extremely long slender tongue. It includes the genera Noctopterus, Bonycterus, Myonycterus, and Macroglossus.

macroglossia (mak-ro-glos-iä), n. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + glossa, the tongue = see glossa] In pathology, hypertrophy of the tongue.

macroglossine (mak-ro-glos-in), a. [As Macroglossa + -ine] Same as macroglossate.

Macroglossus (mak-ro-glos-us), n. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + glossa, the tongue = see glossa] A genus of very small fruit-bats, with the dental formula as in Myotis, but the index finger with a claw. M. minimus is a common Indian species, smaller than the Myotis of Europe.

macrognathic (mak-ro-gnäth-ik), a. [Gr. < makros, long, + gnathos, the jaw = see gnathos] Having long jaws, prognathous. Applied by Huxley to human skulls of Neolithic age, of a broad or rounded form, with prominent prebials and angular or beaver-shaped facial region, and highly developed and procurent jaws.

macrognathous (mak-ro-gnäth-us), a. Same as macrognathic.

macrogonidium (mak-ro-go-nid-i-um), n. pl. macrogonidia (-ä) [NL., < Gr. makros, long, large, + gonium, q. s.] In bot., a large gonidium as compared with others produced by the same species. See gonidium and microgonidium.

macrolepidopter (mak-ro-lep-i-döp'ter), n. Any member of the group Macrolepidoptera.

Macrolepidoptera (mak-ro-lep-i-döp'terä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + lepidopteron, q. s.] Lepidopterous insects of considerable size as collectively distinguished from the smaller forms, which are called Microlepidoptera. The name includes all the butterflies or Rhopala, and the following six families of the Heteroptera: Lymantriidae, Geometridae, Limnephilidae, Notulidae, and Ctenopodidae.

macrolepidopterist (mak-ro-lep-i-döp'ter-ist), n. [As Macrolepidoptera + -ist] One who is versed in the natural history of the Macrolepidoptera.

Macroleptes (mak-ro-lep'tez), n. pl. [NL., (Swainson 1839)] A tribe of acanthopterygian fishes distinguished by the development of conspicuous scales and large branchial apertures. It was intended to include the periform, heterodontoid, labroid, and similar fishes. [Rarely used.]

macrology (mak-ro-lö-jä), n. [NL., macrologia, < Gr. makros, long, speaking, < makros, long, + logos, speak = see -ology] Long and tedious talk, prolonged discourse, with little or nothing to say, superfluous of words. [Rare.]

macromeral (mak-ro-me-räl), a. [As macromere + -al] Of or pertaining to a macromere, as, macromeral blastomeres.

macromere (mak-ro-me-rä), n. [Gr. makros, long, + meros, a part] In embryol., the larger one of two unequal masses into which the vitellus of a lancelet branches as a fresh water mussel, divides, the so-called vegetative cell of Stahl, which subdivides into blastomeres, partly by fusion partly by gemination. See macromerite.

macromeric (mak-ro-me-rik), a. [As macromere + -ic] Same as macromeral. Huxley.

macromeritic (mak-ro-me-rit-ik), a. [As macromere + -itic + -a] In lithol., an epithet introduced by Vogel to designate the granitoid structure of a rock when developed coarsely enough to be recognizable by the naked eye. Macromeritic is opposite to macromeritic, the latter indicating a crystalline structure to be visible without the aid of the microscope.

macrometer (mak-ro-me-ter), n. [Gr. makros, long, + metron, measure] A mathematical instrument for measuring inaccessible heights and objects by means of two reflectors on a common sextant.

macromolecule (mak-ro-mö-lä), n. [Gr. makros, long, + molekule] A molecule consisting of several molecules. (C. I. Strong, 1885) macromylon (mak-ro-mä-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + mylon] One of a series of the medulla oblongata, same as the myelophallus of Huxley and the metencephalon of Gray and most anatomists.

macromyelonial (mak-ro-mä-lon-äl), a. [As macromylon + -al] Pertaining to the macromylon, metencephalic.

macron (mak-ro-n), n. [Gr. makros, long, + alpha, the first letter of the alphabet] A long, deep far, large, great long in time, as makro-n, makro-n, makro-n, length and probability matter (makro-n, makro-n, makro-n). In gram., a short horizontal line placed over a vowel to show that it is long in quantity, or as in English, has a 'long' sound, opposed to the breve or mark of a short vowel. Thus in Greek makro-n (in Latin makro-n) the long vowels correspond to the short vowels ä, ö, e, i, u etc. In English makro-n is the conventional notation of the same sounds of these vowels. In this dictionary in the etymology, the makro-n is used uniformly to indicate a vowel long in quantity, the exclusion of the breve (except in Greek) and the alpha which are elsewhere often used for the same purpose. Thus the Anglo-Saxon and Icelandic long vowels from the Teutonic usually denoted by the alpha are uniformly marked with the makro-n (the alpha in Anglo-Saxon being retained only as a convenient indication of a diphthong as in et, æ, ö, k). Also called macron.

Macronemes (mak-ro-ne-mes), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. makros, long or large, + ne-mes, a thread, + -es] A name given by Saccardo to various submicroscopic of the Uredinales, depending upon the size of the hyphae.

macronucleus (mak-ro-nü-kle-us), n. pl. macronuclei (-ä) [NL., < Gr. makros, long, large, + nucleus, q. s.] A large nucleus which may subdivide into or be replaced by smaller nuclei.

Macronyches (mak-ro-ni-kéz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + nyx (nyx), claw, talon = see onyx] In Sundevall's classification of birds, a cohort of Gallinae, composed of the Australian mound-birds or Megapodidae.

Macronyx (mak-ro-ni-kéz), n. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + nyx (nyx), claw, talon = see onyx] 1. In ornith., a genus of African larks of the family Alaudidae, named by Swainson in 1837 on account of the long hind claw. There are several species, as M. capensis. 2. In entom.: (a) A genus of exotic rubber-flies of the family Asilidae. (b) A genus of arctid moths. Felder, 1874.

macropetalous (mak-ro-pet-ä-lus), a. [Gr. makros, long, + petala, a leaf (petal) = see petal] In bot., having large petals.

macrophthalmous (mak-rof-thäl-mus), a. [Gr. makros, long, large, + ophthalmos, eye = see ophthalmos] In zool., having large eyes.

macrophyllous (mak-ro-fil-lus), a. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, large, + phyllos, a leaf = see phyllos] In bot., consisting of elongated, extended leaflets or foliose expansions; opposed to microphyllous.

macrophyllous (mak-ro-fil-lus), a. [Gr. makros, long, large, + phyllos, a leaf = see phyllos] In bot., having large leaves.

Macropina (mak-ro-pi-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Macropus + -ina] A division of Macropodina, containing the kangaroos. J. E. Gray, 1835.

macropinacoid (mak-ro-pin-ä-köid), n. [Gr. makros, long, + pinax (pinax), a board, tablet, + -oides, form] In crystal, a plane parallel to the vertical and macrodiagonal axes of an orthorhombic crystal. See pinacoid.

macropinacoidal (mak-ro-pin-ä-köid-äl), a. [As macropinacoid + -al] Of or pertaining to a macropinacoid; as, macropinacoidal planes.

Macropiper (mak-ro-pi-per), n. [NL., (F. A. Miquel, 1846) < Gr. makros, long, + piper, = see piper] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants belonging to the natural order Piperaceae and the tribe Pipereae, characterized by an ovary without a collar and one ovule; flowers imperfect, usually in dense axillary spikes, and the fruit sessile, the berries often having the fleshy bracts and rachis united with them to form a multiple fruit. There are about 6 species natives of the islands in the Pacific. They are shrubs with erect stems and alternate leaves or petioles dilated at the base. Macropiper is the only native species, which grows from whose root a stimulant beverage is made (see Macropiper). Macropiper is the native name of New Zealand the kawa kawa, a small aromatic tree, furnishing a tea and a remedy for toothache, and bearing yellow berries edible except the seeds.

macroleural (mak-ro-plä-räl), a. [Gr. makros, long, + leura, side = see pleura] Having long pleurae, specifically applied to certain trilobites, in distinction from brachyleural. Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXII, 475.

macropod (mak-ro-pod), a. and n. [Gr. makros, long, + pod (pod), foot = see foot] 1. A having long or large feet or legs.

II. a. A long-legged or long-footed animal.

macropodal (mak-ro-pod-äl), a. [As macropod + -al] Same as macropod.

macropodan (mak-ro-pod-än), a. and n. [As macropod + -an] Same as macropod.

Macropodia (mak-ro-pö-di-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. makros, long, + podia, long-footed = see macropod] A genus of spider-crabs or sea-spiders founded by W. E. Leach in 1813 upon the common British species formerly known as Cancer phalangium, and made the type of a family Macropodidae. Stenorhynchus of Latreille is a synonym.

Macropodiidae (mak-ro-pö-di-ä-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Macropodia + -idae] A family of enormously long-legged crabs typified by the genus Macropodia. Leptopodidae is a synonym. Also Macropodidae.

macropodian (mak-ro-pö-di-än), a. and n. [As macropod + -ian] 1. A long-legged; macropod; specifically, of or pertaining to the Macropodidae.

II. a. A long-legged crab; a member of Leach's family Macropodidae.

Macropodidae (mak-rō-pōd'i-dē), n. pl. [Macropus (-pōd-) + -idae.] 1. A family of marsupial mammals of the order Diplopoda or Marsupialia; the kangaroos. The weight of the body is in the hind quarters, back, and tail, these parts being disproportionately enlarged. The head is long with large ears and bushy eyebrows; the physiognomy resembling that of some rodents; the neck is slender, and the two quarters are light, with small limbs ending in five-fingered hands. The hind feet have no inner toe, the second and third toes being joined and inclosed in skin; the weight of the body is borne upon the enlarged fourth and fifth digits. The stomach is sacculated and the diet strictly herbivorous. The dental formula is: 3 incisors above and 1 below on each side; 1 canine, 1 premolar, and 4 molars in each upper jaw; 2 molars in each lower jaw. In all teeth, of which the upper canines may be absent, and 1 molar on each side above and below may be deciduous. The leading genera are Macropus, Halmaturus, Lagurus, Phascogale, Dendrolagus, and Dorcopsis. See kangaroo. 2. Same as Macropodidae.

Macropodinae (mak-rō-pōd'i-nē), n. pl. [Macropus (-pōd-) + -inae.] The leading subfamily of Macropodidae; the kangaroos proper. When the kangaroo-rats (Hypodipodomys) were included in Macropodidae, this family was divisible into Macropodinae and Hypodipodominae.

macropodous (mak-rō-pō-dus), a. [Macropus + -ous.] In bot., long-footed; of a leaf, having a long footstalk; of a monocotyledonous embryo, having the radicle large in proportion to the cotyledon.

Macropoma (mak-rō-pō-mā), n. [Macropus, long, + poma, a cover, lid (operculum).] A genus of fossil eelacanthoid ganoid fishes founded by Agassiz upon forms of Cretaceous age with homocercal tail and large operculum.

macropism (mak-rō-prizm), n. [Macropus, long, + pisma, prism.] A prism of an orthorhombic crystal lying between the unit prism and the macropinoid.

macropter (mak-rō-ptēr), n. [Gr. makropteros, long-winged; see macropterus.] An animal with long wings or fins.

macropteran (mak-rō-ptēr-an), a. Same as macropterous.

macropterous (mak-rō-ptēr-us), a. [Gr. makropteros, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropus (mak-rō-pus), n. [Macropus, long-footed; see macropod.] 1. The typical genus of Macropodidae, established by Shaw in 1800. M. major is the giant kangaroo, or forester. See forester, 4, and cut under Lamington. — 2. A generic name which has been variously used for certain fishes, birds, insects, and crustaceans, but is no longer in use, being antedated by the same name in mammalogy.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

Macropygia (mak-rō-pij'i-gā), n. [Macropygia, long-winged, makros, long, + ptēr, wing, = E. feather.] Long-winged; macropteran; longipennine or longipennate, as a bird.

and change of plumage the species resemble sandpipers. M. prius is the common red-breasted or grey backed snipe or dowitcher of North America. Also written Macropygia.

macrohine (mak-rō-rin), a. [Gr. makros, long, + hine, long, = E. long.] Having a long nose or snout.

Macrochirus (mak-rō-rin-us), n. [Macros, long, + chirus, long, = E. long.] 1. A genus of Phacelia, of the subfamily Gnaphorinae, characterized by the prothorax of the male; the elephant-seeds or sea-elephants. M. elephantinus or elephantus is an enormous phacelia found on the coasts and islands of southern South America. M. macrochirus is named by Willd. as a distinct species.

2. A genus of coleopterous insects.

macrocelidan (mak-rō-sel'i-dan), a. Having the characters of the Macrocelididae.

Macrocelididae (mak-rō-sel'i-dē), n. [Macros, long, + celid, long, = E. long.] The typical genus of the family Macrocelididae. It contains the typical elephant-seeds, such as M. prodromus. Nitid species have been described all Africa. Probably Macrocelididae. See cut under elephant-seed.

Macroscopia (mak-rō-skō-pi-a), n. [Macros, long, + scopia, covering.] A small genus of such phallicaceous plants of the tribe Cynanchae. The tube of the fleshy corolla is thick, and the five-lobed limb is very spreading, a crown of five scales is inserted in the throat. The stigma is depressed. The genus embraces 2 or 4 closely related species of twining, high climbing shrubby plants covered with bristly hairs, ranging from Peru to Central America. One of the species furnish the aromatic bitter drug condurango.

macroscian (mak-rō-si-an), a. and n. [Gr. makros, long, + scian, shadow.] 1. a. Casting a long shadow, as persons or objects in high latitudes.

II. n. One who casts a long shadow; specifically, an inhabitant of the arctic or the antarctic zone; so called because objects near the poles intercept the sun's rays at a very low angle, and therefore cast very long shadows. Compare antiscian.

macroscopic (mak-rō-skōp'ik), a. [Gr. makros, long, + scopos, view.] Same as megascopic.

macroscopical (mak-rō-skōp'i-kal), a. [Macroscopic + -al.] Same as megascopic. Quinn. Med. Dict., p. 892.

macroscopically (mak-rō-skōp'i-kal-i), adv. By the naked eye; by superficial inspection, as distinguished from minute or microscopic inspection; without the use of magnifiers.

macroseptum (mak-rō-sēp'tum), n. [Macro, long, + septum, a partition; see septum.] A large perfect septum or mensentery of an actinozoan, furnished with reproductive organs, opposed to microseptum.

macrostomion (mak-rō-s'tōn), n. [Macros, long, + stomion, mouth; see stomion.] The large horny internal tendocranial siphon or funnel of some cephalopods. See macrostomion.

macrostomula (mak-rō-s'tōn-lā), n. [Macros, long, + stomula, mouth; see stomula.] The larval stage of certain cephalopods, as nautilus, during which the large endocranial siphon makes its appearance. Hyll. Proc. Hist. Nat. Hist., 1867.

macrostomular (mak-rō-s'tōn-lār), a. [Macrostomion + -ar.] Macrostomulate.

macrostomulate (mak-rō-s'tōn-lāt), a. [Macrostomula + -ate.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a macrostomula. Amer. Nat., XXII, 476.

macrostomite (mak-rō-s'tōm-it), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stoma, body; see stoma.] A large somite or primitive metamere; one of the larger primary segments or divisions of the embryo of some insects, preceding the formation of the definitive metameres, or metamorphoses. Amer. Nat., XXII, 941.

macrostomitic (mak-rō-s'tōm-it'ik), a. [Macrostomite + -ic.] Of the nature of a macrostomite; pertaining to a macrostomite. Amer. Nat., XXII, 941.

macrostachya (mak-rō-stāk'i-ā), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stachys, a spike, = E. spike.] Same as macrostachya.

macrostachyophore (mak-rō-s'tāk'i-ō-fōr), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stachys, a spike, = E. spike.] The envelope or foliage-leaf about or bearing the macrostachyum.

The foliage leaves, the envelopes of the spore-bearing leaves, the micro- and macrostachyophores had become permanently differentiated in ascending order. Geol. Soc. Brit., XVI, 308.

macrostachyum (mak-rō-s'tāk'i-ā), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stachys, a spike, = E. spike.] A sporangium containing macrospores. It is homologous with the ovule of flowering plants. Also called gonotheca.

The microspores, doubtless through the intervention of a spore-eating insect, had come to germinate upon the macrostachyum instead of upon the ground. Geol. Soc. Brit., XVI, 308.

macrospore (mak-rō-spōr), n. [Gr. makros, long, + spora, seed; see spore.] 1. In bot., an asexually produced spore of large size as compared with others belonging to the same species. It is the female spore, and is homologous with the embryo-sac of phanerogams. See heterospore and microspore, and cut under fungus.

In some of the living club mosses there are two kinds of spores, one being much larger than the other. The larger are known as macrospores, whilst the smaller are called microspores. Huxley, Pteridology, p. 341.

2. In coal, one of the spore-like elements, few in number, but of relatively large size, into which the bodies of many monads become subdivided. Also megaspore.

Macrosporium (mak-rō-spōr'i-um), n. [Gr. makros, long, + spora, seed.] A genus of ascomycetous fungi with erect, basal, pedicellate, and at length septate spores.

macrosporoid (mak-rō-spōr'oid), a. [Gr. makros, long, + spora, seed, + -oides, form.] Resembling or related to the genus Macrosporium.

macrosporophyll, macrosporophyll (mak-rō-spōr'ō-fil), n. [Gr. makros, long, + spora, seed, + phyllos, leaf.] The leaf-bearing macrosporophyll of the heterosporous Pteridophyta, the homologue of the carpel in the Phanerogamae.

Macrostachya (mak-rō-stāk'i-ā), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stachys, a spike, = E. spike.] A genus of fossil plants established by Schimper (1869), belonging to the Calamitaceae or Equisetaceae. They are arborescent plants, with appressed linear leaves, the leaf scars are marked upon the articulations by transverse oval rings, like the flanks of a chain, the scars of the branches are verticillate, large, round umbonate with a stigmatal ventral mammilla; the apices are very large, cylindrical; the branches are leucocylate, rotate in the middle, striated, scarcely longer than the internodes. Fourteen species are known, ranging from the Lower Carboniferous to the Permian, and occurring in Saxony, Prussia, Bohemia, Siberia, France, England, and Spain, as well as to Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Illinois, and Arkansas.

Macrostoma (mak-rō-s'tōm), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, + stoma, mouth.] A family of tracheated gastropods with a very large mouth or aperture to the shell, such as those of the genera Stomatia and Stomatella. Lamarck, 1812. Also Macrostomata, Macrostomidae (Jay, 1836), and Macrostomidae.

macrostome (mak-rō-s'tōm), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stoma, mouth.] A gastropod whose shell has a very wide or patent aperture, as one of the Haliotidae.

Macrostomida (mak-rō-s'tōm'i-dā), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, + stoma, mouth.] Same as Macrostoma.

Macrostomum (mak-rō-s'tōm), n. [Gr. makros, long, + stoma, mouth.] A genus of rhadocelous turbellarians, among the simplest of the Asplanchna. It has no protrusile buccal proboscis. The male and female organs are united in the same individual, but open by separate apertures.

macrostyle (mak-rō-stīl), n. [Gr. makros, long, + styla, pillar; see style.] In bot., having an unusually long style.

macrostylospore (mak-rō-s'tīlō-spōr), n. [Gr. makros, long, + styla, pillar, + spora, seed.] In bot., a stylospore of large size as compared with others of the same species. See stylospore.

Macrostaria (mak-rō-s'tār'i-a), n. pl. [Gr. makros, long, + stara, any broad, flat surface; see larva.] In Hager's classification (1811), a family of his Pollicata, including the tardier and certain of the lemniscs.

macrostarian (mak-rō-s'tār'i-an), a. and n. [Gr. Makrostaria + -an.] 1. a. Having long larva.

II. n. An animal that has long larva.

Macrura (mak-rō-rō), n., pl. [NL., neut. pl. of macrurus, long-tailed: see macrurus.] A sub-order or superfamily group of stalk-eyed tho-

Macrurus (mak-rö'rus), n. [NL.; see macrurus.] 1. In ichth., the typical genus of Macruridae, having a long tapering tail. M. labrid.

right valve a cardinal with. The mantle is open in front, and the long united siphonal tubes are fringed with tentaculiform processes. The foot is ligniform. The Mollusca are usually marine shells of wide distribution. They are also called Mollusca, Mollusca, Mollusca, and Mollusca.

a. The following is a summary of the data for the first three years of the study:

phr. < E. madder. Cf. Skt. madhura, the name of several plants, < madhura, sweet, tender, < madhu, sweet: see maud.] 1. A plant of the genus Rubia, natural order Rubiaceae, yielding a valuable dyestuff of the same name. The ordinary dyer's madder is R. tinctorum, native of the Middle Eastern region, a climbing, herbaceous, or at the base somewhat shrubby plant, with a whole of dark green leaves and panicles of small yellowish flowers. It was formerly esteemed as an emmenagogue and diuretic. R. cordifolia, of India, eastern Asia, and parts of Africa, affords garance and is used for the same purposes as European madder. It forms the madder of India, the Bengali madder or munbet. R. perigrina is the proper wild madder of England, found throughout western and southern Europe. 2. A dyestuff and pigment obtained from the roots of Rubia tinctorum and other plants of the same family. It yields colors of the greatest permanence, and is employed in dyeing linen and cotton red. Two kinds are fixed upon cotton: one is called madder-red, and the other, which possesses a much higher degree of lustre and fixity, is called Adrianople red, because it is largely exported from that city, or Turkey red, from the fact that for a long time it was mainly obtained from the Levant; it is also produced near Leghorn and Trieste. In the trade this madder bears the name of alcantara or levert. The roots are broken up by means of wooden stampers, which reduce the bark and split bark to powder, leaving the hard inner part unbroken; but the whole root is sometimes pulverized. The coloring principle of madder is termed alcanthra. Madder contains also a red pigment, purpurin or rubicarin, which is extracted in the form of orange-colored prismatic crystals, and yields a good dye, either alone or in combination with alizarin. Through the peculiar chemical affinity of purpurin for lime for its coloring matter, madder is noted for its remarkable physiological effect of turning red the bones of animals to which it is fed, as well as the claws and beaks of birds. Brown madder, a lake prepared from madder root, having a rich brown color of great depth. Capucine madder. See capucine. Flowers of madder, the trade-name for a preparation made by steeping pulverized madder, causing the sugar it contains to ferment, then washing the residue, pressing out the water, drying, and pulverizing it again. It is used for dyeing purposes in the same manner as ordinary madder. Also called colored madder and madder bloom. Indian madder, (a) Rubia cordifolia, (b) Olea alaudia umbellata. (c) some species of the genus Hedyotis. — Madder-brown. See brown. Madder-carmine, a pigment made by precipitating the coloring matter of the madder root upon a base of alumina. Madder color, a pigment derived from madder or its compounds. Madder colors range from brown, through yellow, rose, and red, to deep purple and are much used in dyeing and the fine arts. Madder lakes (pink madder, rose madder, madder lake, purple madder, brown madder, Rubia's madder, madder yellow, madder-orange) lakes prepared from madder varying in shade from pink through red and yellow to purple and brown. These are also known as rubric lakes. — Madder-red. See red. Madder style, a method of calico-printing in which the parts of the cloth which are to receive a madder color are printed with a mordant, washed and rinsed in a solution of alum and soda, and then drawn through a colored solution which becomes fixed where the mordant has been applied, after which the dye is washed off the unmordanted part of the cloth. Also called chautz style, garance style. Petty madder, a plant of the genus Cerastium, of the Mediterranean region. Also called cruciger. Painted madder. Same as flowers of madder. Wild madder. (a) Rubia perigrina. (b) The white bedstraw, Galium mollugo.

madder (mad'ér), v. t. [< madder], n. To dye with madder.

I madder clothe to be dyed, in garance. Your violet hath not his full dye, but he is maddered. Palgrave.

madder (mad'ér), n. [Possibly a corruption of mazer.] A large wooden drinking-vessel.

I quebaugh to our feast
In palis was brought up,
An hundred at least,
And a madder our cup. Swift, Irish Feast. (Drover.)

madder-bloom (mad'ér-blóm), n. Flowers of garance. See flowers of madder, under madder.

madder-print (mad'ér-print), n. Cloth printed with designs in madder, or in colors of which madder forms a part; especially, cotton prints so made.

madderwort (mad'ér-wért), n. Any plant of the madder family, Rubiaceae.

madding (mad'ing), n. [Verbal n. of mad], v. Madness; folly; a vagary; a wild frolic or prank.

By my troth, your sorrow
Have put me into a serious contemplation. Pletcher, Wildgoose Chase, II. 5.

madding (mad'ing), v. n. Becoming mad; acting madly; distracted; raging; furious.

But now from me hys madding mynd is starte,
And woe the Widdowes daughter of the glennes. Spenser, Shep. Cal. April

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife
Gray, Kilguy

Then schemes I framed more calmly, when and how The madding factions might be tranquillized. Woodsworth, Prelude, 2.

maddingly (mad'ing-ly), adv. In a mad way; distractedly; wildly.

Run maddingly affrighted through the villages. Pletcher, Women Pleased, IV. 1.

maddle (mad'l), v.; pret. and pp. maddled, ppr. maddling. [Freq. of mad], v. 1. Intrans. To rave; to be delirious. Levi's. — 2. To be confused. [Prov. Eng.]

II. trans. To confuse; perplex. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

maddling (mad'ling), p. a. [Formerly also mad-luff; ppr. of maddle, v.] Having; mad; crazy.

Som takes a staf for haat, and leaves his launce, Som madding runnes, som tumberbs in a trance. Hudson, tr. of Du Bartas & Judith, VI. 240.

maddock (mad'ok), n. [< ME. mathek, < Irish. muthk = Norw. makk = Dan. madlik, a maggot; ditt. of the form which appears in AN. matha, etc., E. madd, madd; see madd.] The same word appears contracted in mack, q. v.] A maggot. Kennett MS. (Hallivell.)

mad-doctor (mad'dok'tor), n. A physician who treats insane persons; an alienist. [Colloq.] made (mad), p. a. [Ip. of make], 1. (Created; wrought; fabricated; constructed.

And mercy then will breathe within your lips,
Like man now made. Shak., M. for M., II. 2. 70.

2. Artificially produced; formed independently of natural development; as, made ground (ground made up of earth from another place); a made word.

And Art, with her contending, doth aspire
To excel the natural with made delights. Spenser, Muchoyntes, I. 106.

3. Drawn from various sources; formed of several parts or ingredients; as, a made dish; composite; built up; as, a made mast (a mast composed of several sticks bound together by iron hoops, in contradistinction to a single-spur mast).

A made dish, . . . garnished with cut carrots by way of adornment. Dalzer, Pelham, XII.

4. Placed beyond the reach of want; assured of reward, success, fortune, or promotion; well provided for life.

Seph. Oh, happy I!
Oh, you are a made man. Fletcher, Mad Lover, v. 4.

Help us to break his worship's house, and carry off the girl, and you are a made man. Sheridan, St. Patrick's Day, II. 1.

5. Well taught or trained, as a hunting-slog.

To make a trial whether a young bloodhound was well instructed for, as the hunters call it, made. Quoted in The Century, XXXVIII. 191.

Made block. See block. Made up. (a) Put together; completed; finished.

Deformed, unfinished, sent before my time Into this breathing world, scarce half made up. Shak., Rich. III., I. 1. 21.

(b) Thorough; consummate; out-and-out. [Rare.]

Yet remain assured
That he's a made-up villain. Shak., T. of A., v. 1. 101.

(c) Artificial; counterfeit.

Had, but you must allow her some beauty?
Fony. Bumbay? She's all a made-up thing. Th. Smith, She Stoops to Conquer, II. 1

(d) Connected; invented; fictitious; as, a made-up tale or exercise.

made, n. See maud.

made (mad), a. [A var. of mad], (perhaps < Irish. madder, maimed; see mad), or of made], Fatigued; exhausted. [Scotch.] Madecassoe (mad-e-kas'oe), a. and n. Same as Malagasy.

madefaction (mad'ef-ak'shon), n. [= F. madefaction, < L. as if "madefactus"], n. madefacere, pp. madefactus, make wet, moisten: see made.] The act of making wet; a soaking; saturation.

To all madefaction there is required an imbibition. Arno, Nat. Hist., 2. 200.

madefication (mad'ef-ik-ashon), n. [< madify + -ation; see -ication]. Same as madefaction.

madefy (mad'ef-i), v. t. [= F. madefier, < L. as if "madefacere", equiv. to madefacere, make wet. < madere, be wet, + facere, make: see -fy.] To make wet or moist; moisten; soak.

The time was when the Bonners and butchers rode over the faces of their victims, and maddened the earth with their bloods. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 55. (Drover.)

Madegassy (mad-e-gas'i), a. and n. [See Malagasy.] Name as Malagasy.

Madeira (ma-da'ra), n. [Short for Madeira wine. The island of Madeira takes its name from Pg. madeira, wood, < L. materia, wood, matter: see matter.] A fine wine of the sherry class made in the island of Madeira. It acquires by age peculiar excellence of flavor. — East India Madeira, Madeira which has been sent in cask to the East Indies and back again, with the view of improving it, or aging it rapidly by the combined agency of heat and the constant motion of the ship.

Madeira mahogany. Same as canary-wood. Madeiran (ma-da'ran), a. [< Madeira (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to the island of Madeira, or to the group of islands of which it is the chief, lying west of Morocco, and belonging to Portugal.

Madeira-vine (ma-da'ra-vin), n. An elegant climbing herb with bright-green fleshy leaves, long clusters of small white spicy-fragrant flowers, and a perennial tuberous root. It is a rhizopodiaceous plant, Boussingaultia baselloides, from the Andes.

Madeira-wood (ma-da'ra-wúd), n. The true mahogany.

madel-paroowa (mad'el-pa-ró-wé), n. A boat used in Ceylon for fishing, chiefly close inshore and on the lakes of the interior, sometimes covered with a bamboo roof, when it takes the name of padfi. Imp. Dict.

mademoiselle (ma-de-mwó-zel'), n.; pl. mesdemoiselles (ma-de-mwó-zel'). [F., < mes, my, + demoiselle, damsel: see madam and damsel, demoiselle.] 1. Formerly, in France, the title of any woman, married or single, who was not of the nobility, and of noble married women whose husbands had not been knighted; also, when used absolutely, or without a name, the distinctive title of the eldest daughter of the next brother of the king (who was in like manner called Monsieur), and afterward of the first princesses of the blood, whoever was her father. In general, the titles Madame and Mademoiselle were used to distinguish noble from plebeian women, without regard to conditions of marriage or celibacy; but Little notes the fact that Racine, in writing to his sister, addressed her as Madame before her marriage and as Mademoiselle after it.

Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, . . . Duchesse de Montpensier is forgotten, . . . but the great name of Mademoiselle, La Grande Mademoiselle, gleams through the age of Louis Quatorze.

T. W. Higginson, Atlantic Essays, p. 126.

2. A distinctive title given to girls and unmarried women in France, equivalent to Miss; abbreviated in writing to Mlle., pl. Mlles. — 3. A sciencoid fish, the yellowtail or silver perch, Merluccius chrysurus. [Local, U. S.] madge (maj), n. [Assimilated form of mag], like the orig. Madge, assimilated form of Mag, abbr. of Margaret, a fem. name: see mag, margaret.] 1. The magpie, Pica rustica; same as mag, 1. — 2). A madge-owl.

The screech-owl, used in falling towns to lodge,
Th' unquiet night raven, and thou black madge,
That, fearful light, still seekest where to hide,
The hate and scorn of all the birds beside. Du Bartas (trans.) (Nares.)

madge (maj), n. [Origin obscure.] A leaden hammer. See the quotation.

The tool used for this purpose (hard solder plating) is called a madge, and is a lead hammer about three pounds in weight, with the face covered with six or seven thicknesses of stout wooten. Gilder's Manual, p. 103.

madge-howl (maj'hóu'let), n. See madge-owl.

I'll sit in a barn with madge-howl, and catch mice first. R. Jones, Every Man in his Humour, II. 2.

madge-owl (maj'ou'let), n. The owl or barn owl. Also madge-owle, madge-howl.

Thou shouldst have given her a madgeowl, and then

madge-owlet (maj'ou'let), n. Same as madge-owl.

mad-headed (mad'hed'ed), a. Hot-brained; rash. Shak., I Hen. IV., II. 3. 80.

madhouse (mad'hóus), n. A house where insane persons are confined for cure or for restraint; a lunatic asylum; a bedlam.

Madia (ma'di-á), n. [NL. (Molina, 1794), < modi, the Chilian name of the common species.] A genus of composite herbs belonging to the tribe Helianthoides and the subtribe Madieae, characterized by a deeply furrowed involucre, with bracts closely inclosing the achenia, of which those of the disk are either perfect or sterile, almost always without pappus. They are erect annuals, commonly glandular-viscid and hairy-scand, with entire alternate leaves and small or medium-sized heads of yellow flowers, solitary at the ends of the branches or in loose panicles. About 8 species are known, natives of Chili and the western part of North America, where they are popularly called coyote-weed. One species, M. sativa, is cultivated for the oil extracted by its seeds, which serves the same purposes as olive-oil. The genus is made into an oil-cake for cattle.

madid (mad'id), a. [< L. madidus, wet, < madere, be wet. Cf. Gr. mader, moist; see moderous.] Wet; moist; appearing as if soaked or sodden. [Rare.]

The large deep-blue eye, madid and yet piercing, showed that the functions of his brain were apportioned half to vision, and half to common sense.

Parrot, Comingsby, I. 2.

Madia (mā-dī'ā), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1885), < Madia + -ia.] A subtribe of composite plants, typified by the genus Madia, comprised in the tribe Helianthoidae. It is characterized by radiate or subradiate heads, the ray-flowers being fertile, and the disk-flowers perfect (but some or all of them are sometimes sterile); the bracts of the involucre in one series, partly or wholly inclosing the achenes of the ray-flowers; the chasm of the receptacle in one or two rows, linear united, generally none between the central flower, and the achenes of the rays without pappus. The subtribe comprises genera and about 30 species, the majority growing in the western part of North America.

madisterium (mad-is-tē'ri-um), n.; pl. madisteria (-iā). [Gr. madisterion, tweezers for pulling out hair, < madia, pull out the hair. Cf. madia, fall away, as the hair: see madianus.] A surgical instrument for extracting hairs; a pair of tweezers.

madling (mad'ling), n. [C. mad + ling] A mad person. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Good-for-naught madling, flinging a precious gift of God under foot. E. Bronte, Wuthering Heights, III.

madling, a. An obsolete form of maddling.

madly (mad'li), adv. In a mad manner. (a) Without reason or understanding. (b) Frantically, furiously. (c) With extreme folly, or intemperate zeal or passion.

madman (mad'man), n.; pl. madmen (-men). A man who is insane; a distracted man; a lunatic; a crazy person.

madrep (mad'nep), n. [Appar. < mad + rep.] A tall umbelliferous plant, Horaceum Sphenodylum, of Europe and subarctic regions.

madness (mad'nos), n. 1. The state of being mad or distracted; insanity; lunacy.

But as to him who talks and utters
And call'd his rigorous madness raging fits;
Content thee, thou unskillful man, be mad!
My madness keeps my subjects in their wits.
Pam. (15th) Wara, III.

And moody madmen laughing wild Amidst the crowd of men.

Gray, Prospect of Fion College.

2. Headstrong passion or rashness; ungovernable fury or rage; extreme folly.

To lose myself upon no ground were madmen,
Not loyal duty.

Fletcher (and another), Faint, III, 2.

Party is the madness of many for the sake of a few.
Pope, Thoughts on Various Subjects.

Canine madness, see canine. Midsummer madness, see midsummer. Syn. 1. Francy, Mania, etc., see insanity.

madonna (ma-don'ā), n. [It. = F. madame, my lady; see madame, madame.] 1. My lady; madam: an Italian title of address or of courtesy, equivalent to madam.

Clown. Good madonna, why mournest thou?
Others. Good fool, for my brother's death.
Shak. Tit. And., I, 2, 72.

* Specifically — 2. [cap.] The Virgin Mary ("Our Lady"); hence, a picture representing the Virgin. — 3. A kind of luster made in part of alpaca-wool. — Madonna medal, a small medal of silver, brass, or other metal, hung by a ribbon about the neck of a statue of the Virgin and then preserved, serving as a sort of pilgrim's sign.

Madonna-wise (ma-don'ā-wīz), adv. In the manner or fashion of the Madonna: applied to the arrangement of a woman's hair, in imitation of accepted representations of the Madonna, by parting it in the middle, and bringing it close and low over the temples.

Lacks not wide disposed,
Madonna-wise on either side her head.
Tennyson, Imbui.

madoua (mad'ō-kwa), n. [Abyssinian.] A very tiny antelope of Abyssinia, Neotragus minotaur or N. madoua, the smallest of horned animals, about as large as a hare, and with very slender legs. Also called kepech.

madpash (mad'pash), n. and a. [C. mad + pash.] 1. n. A mad fellow. Wright, [North. Eng.]

II. a. Wild; cracked. Idiom.

Let us leave this madpash bodiam, this half-brained boy, and give him leave to rave and dine his belly full, with his private and intimately arranged death.
Fletcher, 17, of Barbelle, III, 25.

madras (ma-dras'), n. [F. madras; so called from Madras in India.] A large handkerchief of silk and cotton, usually in bright colors, used by the negroes in the West India islands and elsewhere for turbans, etc. — Madras gingham, a gingham instituting the colors and design of a madras. — Madras lace, a kind of curcio-madras, sometimes printed to imitate Madras work, simple embroidery done upon bright-colored madras handkerchiefs, the embroidery emphasizing the pattern of the stuff. These embroideries are used for furniture-coverings, banners, etc.

madrasah (ma-dras'), n. [Hind. madrasa, madrasa, a school, college.] In India, a school or college for the education of youth. Also, corruptly, madressah, madrasah, madrasa, madrasah.

The enlightened mind of Warren Hastings did indeed anticipate his age by founding the Calcutta Madrasah for Mahomedan teaching.
Burge, Brit., XII, 714.

Madras hemp, n. See Isenal hemp, under hemp.

madregal (mad're-gal), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A carangoid fish of the genus Seriola.

madreperl (mad're-perl), n. [C. madreperla, < madre, mother, + perl, pearl.] Mother-of-pearl. Longfellow.

Madrepore (ma-drep'ō-rē), n. [NL. < madre + por.] The typical genus of Madrepore, containing some of the commonest madrepores, of various branched shapes, among them some of the most extensive reef-building corals. M. verrucosus is a species so called from its branching like the antlers of deer.

Madreporeacea (mad're-pō-rē-ā), n.; pl. [NL. < Madrepore + -acea.] A group of stony-corals, more or less exactly equivalent to Madroporaria.

madreporeal (mad're-pō-rē-āl), a. [C. madrepore + -al.] Of or pertaining to madrepores; consisting of madrepores.

Madreporearia (mad're-pō-rē-ā-ri-ā), n.; pl. [NL. < Madrepore + -aria.] A general name of the madrepores and related corals which are hexacoralline or hexactinoid and have a continuous hard calcareous skeleton. The term covered only the Madrepore proper, but the Poropora of madrepore corals, the Stylocera of star corals, and related families have still wider scope. Madreporearia is a variety of the class Actinoptera, including all the hard actinoid or actiniform corals or sclerodermatous zoophytes, whether hexacoralline or tetracoralline and whether tabular, tabuloid, polypoid, spicoid, or rugoid. It is then equivalent to Lithothamnium and Sclerodermata or to the old Lithothamnium and Alcyonaria and other actinoid corals.

madreporearian (mad're-pō-rē-ā-ri-ān), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to the Madreporearia, or having their characters.

II. n. A coral of the group Madreporearia.

madrepore (mad're-pō-rē), n. [C. madrepore = Sp. madrepore = Pg. madrepore, < It. madrepore, < Gr. madre, mother, + por, pore, or poros, pore.] 1. n. A coral, or a coral, of the genus Madrepore or family Madreporeidae; the polypite or the polypite of a perforate madreporearian; a name loosely extended to any stony coral with madreporeiform rays or openings. In true madrepore the animal or polypite is hexacoralline, with twelve short tentacles, and the polypite is hexagonal, with long and short tentacles. Madrepore coral consists of carbonate of lime, with traces of siliceous matter and is formed by gradual deposition in the spaces of the compound polyp, so that in course of time the whole polypite, and the spaces of the polypite, are filled with a hard substance. When the animal matter has been removed madrepore is of a white color, wrinkled on the surface, and full of little openings, each of which an individual polypite was judged the radiating organ of the cavity corresponding to the internal divisions of the animal. Madrepore rises up walls and reefs of coral rocks with considerable rapidity in tropical climates. — Madrepore glass, see glass. — Madrepore marble, see marble.

madreporeic (mad're-pō-rē-ik), a. [C. madrepore + -ic.] Of or pertaining to madrepore; of the character of the madrepore; pierced with minute holes like a madrepore. Also madreporeite.

Madrepore canals, in echinodermata, tubular prolongations of the greater vessels of the ambulacral system, having perforated ends and terminating in a calcareous network, or other hard formation known as the madrepore.

body, madrepore tubercle, or madrepore. — Madrepore plate, in echinodermata, a madrepore. — Madrepore tubercle, a tubercular madrepore body, or madrepore.

Madreporeidae (mad're-pō-rē-īdē), n.; pl. [NL. < Madrepore + -idae.] The madrepore family, typified by the genus Madrepore. Its limits vary with different authors, but in the strictest use it consists of several different groups, agreeing in that the polypite and polypite have porous canaliculi, perforated tubercles, developed septa, and an open gastric cavity communicating with the canal in the axis of the branched polypite.

madreporeiform (mad're-pō-rē-ī-fōrm), a. [C. NL. Madrepore, a madrepore, + -ia, form, form.] Resembling a madrepore; characteristic of a madrepore; madreporeic.

Madreporeinae (mad're-pō-rē-ī-nē), n.; pl. [NL. < Madrepore + -inae.] A subfamily of Madreporeidae.

madreporeite (mad're-pō-rē-ī-tē), n. and a. [C. madrepore + -ite.] 1. n. 1. Fossil madrepore. — 2. In echinodermata, the madrepore body or tubercle; the internal alveolar porous plate at the termination of the madrepore canals.

II. a. Same as madrepore.

madreporeitic (mad're-pō-rē-ī-tik), a. [C. madrepore + -itic.] Pertaining to or consisting of madrepore, or made up of various corals more or less mixed with fragments of the shells of mollusks, all loosely clasped together as madrepore; as, madreporeitic rocks.

madrier (mad'rī-er), n. [F. madrier, a beam, a beam or stout plank, < Sp. madro, a beam, < madro, wood; see madro.] In solid engine, (a) In the seventeenth century, a heavy timber forming the chief or central part of the carriage of a cannon or mortar; hence, the whole carriage or mounting of a piece of artillery. (b) A plank lined with tin and covered with earth for roofing over certain parts of military works, in order to afford protection in lodgments, etc. (c) A plank used to support the earth in a mine, or in a moat or ditch to support a wall.

madrigal (mad'rī-gal), n. [C. F. madrigal = Sp. madrigal, madrigal, madrigal = Pg. madrigal, < G. madrigal, < It. madrigale, madrigale, madrigale, a short poem, a pastoral ditty (C. M. matrigale, matrigale, a herd, flock, < L. matris, a stall, a herd, < Gr. matris, a fold, an enclosed space, the bed on which the stone of a ring is set, a monastery. Cf. archimandrite, mandel, from the same Gr. source.) 1. A medieval poem or song, amorous, pastoral, or descriptive. The distinguishing characteristics of the madrigal are now hard to determine.

By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.
Milton, Lamentable shepherd to his love.

2. In music. (a) A musical setting of such a poem in which madrigal-writing involves the use of a canon form, adherent to the use of the classical madrigal, but the abundant use of contrapuntal imitation in all its varieties, and the absence of instrumental accompaniment. This form of composition appeared in the Low Countries in the fifteenth century and soon spread to Italy, Germany, France, and England. In Italy and England it attained a notable perfection and beauty, passing over in the latter country into the madrigal. Madrigals were written for from three to eight or more voices. The sentiments embodied varied from grave to gay, with a constant tendency to the latter. The language in the earlier species and earlier was madrigal. (b) A piece or part-song in general, irrespective of contrapuntal qualities.

madrigaleri (mad'rī-gal-ēr), n. A writer or composer of madrigals.

Matylda, poetress, madrigallera
Tom Brown, Weeks, II, 155. (Diction.)

madrigaletto (mad'rī-gal-ē-tō), n. [It. dim. of madrigale, a madrigal; see madrigal.] A little madrigal.

madrigalian (mad'rī-gal-ē-ān), a. [C. madrigal + -ian.] Of or pertaining to madrigals.

The English madrigalian writers being represented here by Monty's "My Bonny Lam." Athenaeum, July 4, 1887.

madrigalist (mad'rī-gal-ē-ist), n. [C. madrigal + -ist.] A composer or singer of madrigals. Bursey, Hist. Music, IV, 46.

Madriilian (ma-dri-ī-li-ān), a. and n. [C. Madriilian, for Madriilian, the second of being changed by dissimilation to li, an inhabitant of Madrid, < Madrid.] 1. a. Of or belonging to Madrid.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Madrid, the capital of Spain.

madroho (ma-dro'ho), n. A handsome tree, Arbutus Menziesii, of western North America, toward the south becoming a shrub. It bears a yellow berry, scarcely edible. Its wood is very hard, and is much used in the manufacture of gunpowder. Its bark is valuable for tanning. Also madroño.

Madrepore coral

Even the madroño, upon these spurs of Mount Saint Helena, comes to a fine bulk, and tanks with forest trees. Il. L. Alcantara, Silverado Squatters, p. 92.

madstone (mad'stón), n. A stone popularly reputed to cure hydrophobia, or to prevent it when threatened. It is applied to the wound, from which it is supposed to draw the poison. The belief in its value has no scientific sanction. [L. E.]

Among the various individuals in Pennsylvania who profess ability in exorcism and charms, we occasionally find one who is reputed to possess a mad stone. These pebbles are of various sizes and appear to have been selected on account of some peculiarity of color or form. A specimen which had a high reputation in the state from which it had been brought was described by the present writer as consisting of a worn piece of white feldspar, and possessing none of the properties of absorption attributed to it. Proc. Am. Phil. Soc., XLVI (1906), 336.

madu-nut (mad'ú-nut), n. The seed of Cycas circinalis.

Madura foot. A diseased condition of the feet, and hands, occurring in India, characterized by enlargement and distortion of the affected part, ensuing suppuration, softening and fracture of the bones of the part, and the formation of sinuses discharging through frequent openings small yellow bodies like fish-roe or dark grains like coarse gunpowder, and often larger masses. The fungus Claviceps Carteri is found in the diseased parts, and is thought to be the cause of the disease. Also called fungus foot, fungus disease of India, and mycetoma.

madweed (mad'wēd), n. A species of Scutellaria, or skullcap (natural order Labiata), the S. lateriflora so named because it was thought to be efficacious in hydrophobia. Also called mad-dog skullcap.

madwort (mad'wört), n. [maul + wort. Cf. Alyssum.] 1. A plant of the genus Alyssum.—2. [As if a contraction of madderwort, having been used as a substitute for madder.] A plant of the boraginaceae family, Asperugo procumbens, whose root was used like madder; commonly called German madwort.

mae (mā), n. and adv. A Scotch form of no.

meandor, n. See meander.

Meandrina (mē-an-drī'nā), n. [NL.: meander, a winding way (see meander), + -ina.] The typical genus of Meandrinidae, established by Lamarck in 1801. M. cerebriformis is an example. Also spelled Meandrina.

meandrine, n. See meandrina.

Meandrinidae (mē-an-drī'nī-dē), n. pl. [NL.: Meandrina + -idae.] A family of madrepurine corals of the suborder Astrea, typified by the genus Meandrina; the brain-corals or brainstones. These corals are of massive form, caused by the union of many individual corallites in rows which meander or wind about over the surface of the corallum in a manner suggesting the convolutions of the brain. Also spelled Meandrinia.

meandriniform (mē-an-drī'nī-fōrm), a. [NL.: Meandrina + -iform.] Resembling a brain-corall; of or pertaining to the Meandriniformes.

Meandriniformes (mē-an-drī'nī-fōrmēz), n. pl. [NL.: see meandriniform.] The brain-corals. See Meandrinidae.

Meandripora (mē-an-drī'pōrā), n. [NL.: meander, a winding way (see meander), + -pora, a pore; see poros.] Same as Fascicularia.

Meandrospongidae (mē-an-drō'spōnjī-dē), n. pl. [NL.: meandros, a meander, + -spongia, a sponge, + -idae.] A large family of dictyonine hexactinellid silicious sponges, both fossil and recent, in which the body consists of winding tubes of uniform caliber with interstitial vestibular spaces and no uncinata or scopuliform apertures. Also spelled Meandrospongidae.

maelstrom (mal'stróm), n. [An erroneous spelling (sometimes erroneously explained as 'mill stream'); prop. maelstrom or maistrum, formerly maistrand (see maistrand), simulating strand; Norw. maelstrom (little used) (= Dan. maelstrøm), a great whirlpool in the sea, mael (= Dan. maile), grind (see maile), + ström (= Dan. ström), stream; see ström.] 1. A celebrated whirlpool or violent current in the Arctic ocean, near the western coast of Norway, between the islands Moskenæs and Mosken, formerly supposed to suck in and destroy everything that approached it at any time, but now known not to be dangerous except under certain conditions.

It (Joseph Napea) reports of a whirlpool between the Røer islands and Lofot called Uldesund, which from half ebb to half flood is heard to make such a terrible noise as shakes the four rings of Hennes in those islands top mile off. Norw. Hist. Muscovia.

Hence—2. Any restless movement; any influence or passion which makes victims of all who come within its power: as, the maelstrom of fashion or of speculation; the maelstrom of dissipation or of crime.

Mæna (mē'nā), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1829), ¶ L. mæna, ¶ Gr. mæna, a small sea-fish, eaten salted.] The typical genus of Mænidae, chiefly represented in the Mediterranean. M. vulgaris is an example. Formerly also Manan.

menad, menad (mē'nad), n. [¶ L. manna (menad), ¶ Gr. mænā (manad), raving, frantic; as a noun, a mad woman. menad; ¶ mænada, rage, be furious; see manā.] 1. In Gr. myth., a female member of the attendant train of Bacchus; hence, a priestess of Bacchus; one of the women who celebrated the festivals of Bacchus with mad songs and dancing and boisterous courses in gay companies amid the songs of Parnassus and Citharon, particularly on the occasion of the great Triumphant Bacchic festival. The menads supplied a favorite subject to classic art and are characterized by wearing the ivy and by the thyrus and other Dionysiac attributes. Compare Bacchant.

Through Athens faded menad like. Southey, Letters, III. 194. (Dante.)

Hence—2. Any woman under the influence of unnatural excitement or frenzy.

menadic, menadic (mē-nad'ik), a. [¶ mænad, menad, + -ic.] Pertaining to or like the menads; furious; raving; bacchantic.

The rites by some supposed to be of the menadic sort, are held strictly secret.

maenianum (mē-nī-ā-nūm), n. [pl. maeniana (-nā)] [L., a projecting balcony, orig. one in the Forum at Rome, erected under the censor C. Menius, for the convenience of spectators of the gladiatorial combats; neut. of Maenianus, of Menius, ¶ Maenius, the name of a Roman gens.] In Rom. antiq., a balcony or gallery for spectators at a public show. The name, originally applied to a balcony in the Forum, was extended to balconies in general, as to the galleries at the circular end of a circus, and to the ranges of seats above the podium in an amphitheater.

Mænidae (mē-nī-dē), n. pl. [NL.: ¶ Mænā + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Mænā. They are subfusiform percidæ with very prominent upper jaw, chiefly inhabiting warm seas. Several are found in the Mediterranean. Also Mænidæ, Maenidae.

menoid (mē'nōid), n. A fish of the family Maenidae. See J. Richardson.

Mænoides (mē-nōid'ēz), n. pl. [NL.: ¶ Mænā + -oides.] Same as Maenidae. See J. Richardson, 1861.

Mænura, n. An erroneous form of Mænura.

Mæna (mē'nā), n. [NL. (P. Forsk., 1775), ¶ mænā, given as the Ar. name of one of the species.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants, belonging to the natural order Myrsinæ, type of the tribe Mænae, characterized by the two-bracted calyx, the imbricate corolla, and drooping growing in racemes. They are shrubs, with entire dentate or serrate leaves, often pellucid-dotted, small white, five parted flowers, and a small dry or fleshy fruit with many seeds and a persistent style. About 20 species are known, natives of tropical and subtropical Asia and Africa, Australia, and the islands of the Pacific. The ground furnishes some ornamental house-plants.

Mænæ (mē'nē), n. pl. [NL. (Alphonse de Candolle, 1837), ¶ Mænæ + -æ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants of the order Myrsinæ, characterized by a superior or half-superior calyx, a gamopetalous corolla, no stamodia, and a many-seeded fruit. The tribe includes but one genus, Mænæ, with about 20 species, natives of the tropical and subtropical regions of the Old World.

maestoso (mā-es-tō'sō), adv. [It., majestic, ¶ maestoso, majesty; see majesty.] In music, with dignity or majesty; majestically.

maestral, n. A variant of mistral.

Maestricht beds. See bed.

maestro (mā-es'trō), n. [It., ¶ E. maestro, q. v.] A master; specifically, an eminent musical composer, teacher, or conductor.

mafflet (maf'lē), r. i. [¶ ME. mafflen, ¶ MD. maffelen, ¶ D. maffelen, move the jaws, stammer, = LG. maffeln, prattle, = G. dial. maffeln, maffeln, chew with the mouth full; prob. imitative; cf. E. faffle, stammer.] To stammer.

And some maffled with the mouth and not what they mente. Richard the Reddian, iv. 28.

maffled (maf'ld), p. a. See the quotation. [Prov. Eng.]

She was what they call in the country maffled—that is, confused in her intellect. Southey, Letters, III. 194. (Dante.)

mafflet (maf'lē), n. A stammerer. Holland, Plutarch, p. 535.

maffling (maf'ling), n. [Cf. maffle.] A simpleton. Halliwel. [North. Eng.]

maforst, n. [ML.: ¶ MGr. μαφόριον; see def.] Originally, a woman's mantle or cloak, covering the head, neck, and shoulders; later, the maphorion or scapular worn by monks in the Eastern Church.

mafurra-tree (ma-fur'fā-trē), n. [¶ mafurra, mafurra, a native name, + E. tree.] A tree, Trichilia emetica, of the Meliaceæ, found in Mozambique, Madagascar, and the Isle of Réunion. Its fruit is a capsule of two or three cells containing seeds of the size of a cocoa bean, which yield when boiled the mafurra tallow.

mag (mag), n. [Also maggy; ult. abbr. of margaret, like the fem. name Mag, dim. Maggie, abbr. of Margaret; see maggie, margaret. Hence also maggy.] 1. The magpie or magpie.—2. The long-tailed titmouse, Parus caudatus, more fully called long-tailed mag. [Local. Eng.] mag (mag), r. i. pret. and pp. maggied, ppr. maggying. [In allusion to the chatter of the magpie; ¶ mag, the magpie; see mag.] 1. intrans. To chatter; scold. [Prov. Eng.]

II. trans. To tease or vex. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] mag (mag), n. [¶ mag, r. i.] Talk; chatter.

If you have any one in you, we'll draw it out. Mrs. Thrale quoted in Mine, P. Arctur's Diary (ed. 1870).

mag (mag), n. [Also make, malk; origin obscure.] A halfpenny; in Scotland (with plural), a gratuity expected by servants. [Eng. and Scotch.]

It can't be worth a mag to him. Dickens, Black House, iv.

mag (mag), n. An abbreviated form of magazine, 2. [Colloq.]

He is on the staff of I don't know how many papers and mags. Mrs. Alexander, The Prince, p. 41.

mag (mag), r. i. pret. and pp. maggied, ppr. maggying. [Also maggy; conjectured to be of Gypsy origin; cf. Hind. malk, fraud, malkar, a cheat, knave (?).] To steal; carry off clandestinely. [Low slang.] magadis (mag'ā-diz), n. [¶ Gr. μάγδις (ML. magadis), a musical instrument, a kind of cithara, also a Lydian flute (see def.), prob. of Egyptian origin. (¶ Magadis.) 1. A Greek musical instrument resembling the cithara, having about twenty strings tuned in octaves two by two.—2. A Lydian flute or flageolet.—3. A monochord.

magadize (mag'ā-diz), r. i. pret. and pp. maggadized, ppr. maggadizing. [¶ Gr. μάγδιζω, to play on the magadis, play in the octave, ¶ magadis, magadis; see magadis.] In anc. Gr. music: (a) To play upon the magadis. (b) To sing in octaves, as when men and women sing the same melody.

magari, n. [Origin obscure.] A large ship. Thucyd.

Green, Opanda Furina, i. 1.

magarita, magarites (mag'ā-rī'tā, -tēz), n. [ML.: ¶ MGr. μαγάρις, renegade, ¶ μαγάρις, be foul, pollute, defile, contaminate.] In the middle ages, an apostate from Christianity, especially to Mohammedanism.

see mage, Magus. II. a. = F. magique = Sp. mágico = It. magico, L. magicus, Gr. μαγικός, of magic, orig. and prop. 'of the Magi'; Gr. Μαγός, pl. Μαγοί, Magi: see above. Thus, the noun is orig. from the adj.; but in Eng. it precedes it. I. n. 1. Any supposed supernatural art; especially, the pretended art of controlling the actions of spiritual or superhuman beings. Held in such an art exists among all primitive races, and was prevalent in medieval Europe. The practice of magic has embraced, in a great variety of ways, the cure of disease, the forecasting of events, and the gratification of desires otherwise unattainable. It has been everywhere, with the rise and earlier progress of literature, formulated into more or less elaborate systems. All kinds of divination, judicial astrology, and to a large extent alchemy were outgrowths of it.

But though his magic for a while was true,
It seemed that all the rocks were away;
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 567.

If she in chains of magic were not bound,
Shak., Othello, I. 2. 65.

The word magic is still used, as in the ancient world, to include a confused mass of beliefs and practices, hardly agreeing except in being beyond the ordinary actions of cause and effect which men are accustomed to their regularity have come to regard as merely natural.

Encyc. Brit., XV. 160.

2. Power or influence similar to that of enchantment: as, the magic of love.

He [Arnold] has a power of vision as great as Tennyson's, though his magic depends less on the rich hints of association, and more on the liquid colours of pictorial beauty.
Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 628.

3. Conjuring; tricks of legerdemain. [Collon.] — Black magic, magic involving a criminal league with evil spirits; the black art. Natural magic, (a) Occult science; the art of working wonders by means of a superior knowledge of the powers of nature.

Much more is professed, but much less performed, than in former ages, especially in the mathematical and in natural magic.
H. Harpur, Four Letters.

(b) Control of natural forces through the knowledge of their laws.

Was not Persian Magic a reduction or correspondence of the principles and architecture of nature to the rules and policy of governments? . . . And here I will make a request that I may revise and reintegrate the unimpaired and abused name of Natural Magic, which in the true sense is but Natural Wisdom or Natural Prudence, taken according to the ancient conception, purged from vanity and superstition.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning.

Superstitious or goetic magic consists in the invocation of devils or demons, and supposes some fact or express covenant or agreement with them. White magic, practice of magic either quite innocent or at least not involving a compact with the devil.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to or connected with the exercise of magic; having supposed supernatural qualities or powers; enchanting; bewitching: as, magic arts or spells; a magic wand or circle; a magic touch; magic squares.

Shall we think the subtle witted French
Conjurers and sorcerers, that, afraid of him,
By magic verses have contrived his end?
Shak., I Hen. VI., I. 1. 37.

As in Agrippa's magic glass,
The loved and lost arose to view.
Walter, The Merrymark.

2. Produced by or resulting from or as if from magic; exhibiting the effects of enchantment: as, magic music; magic transformations. [In this sense magical is more commonly used.]

Till all thy magical structures, round & high,
Were shattered into heaps o'er thy false head.
Milton, Comus, l. 708.

3. Operating as if by magic; causing illusion; producing wonderful results.

For three or four days, under the magic influence of his wit and imagination, these gloomy old pictures were a perpetual source of amusement and fun.
Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, iv.

Magic circle, a modification of the magic square as devised by Franklin, consisting of eight concentric circles equally divided by eight radii, in the sections of which all the numbers from 1 to 72 are so arranged that the sum of the numbers in each circle, together with 17 entered at the center, is equal to 360, and that the sum of the numbers in each radial column, together with the center 17, is also equal to 360. As reconstructed by Dr. Barnard, the numbers from 1 to 64 are taken, and are so arranged that the constant sum of both concentric and radial ranks, added to 100 entered at the center, is 360. Magic cube, an extension of the arrangement of an arithmetical series in a magic square or parallelepiped to all sides of a hexagon, so that the sum of the numbers in each lineal rank of numbers, parallel to the edges of the cube or the diagonals upon all faces, is constant. In a perfect magic cube every term enters into thirteen distinct equalities. — Magic cylinder, a modification of a perfect magic cube in parallelepiped form when one of its surfaces is transferred to a cylinder having a circumference equal to the edge of the cube, and the vertical squares are arranged in equidistant radii, such a magic cylinder will have either no number at the axis or the same number in the center of every one of the five parallel planes. Magic lantern, see lantern, and cut under derivation. — Magic music, see music. Magic sphere, a modification of a magic cube or parallelepiped when its surface is transferred to a sphere, and the several vertical columns are arranged in equidistant radii. Magic square, a square figure formed by a series of numbers in mathematical proportion, so disposed in parallel and equal ranks that the sum of each row or line taken perpendicularly, horizontally, or diagonally is constant. Magic squares are also formed

44	27	11	19
13	14	46	25
70	53	5	22

An even-numbered magic square whose constant sum is 110.

An odd-numbered magic square whose constant sum is 15.

with the letters of a word, name, phrase, or sentence, so arranged as to read the same in all directions from the initial letter, wherever it appears. The earliest known writers on the subject were Arabians, among whom these squares were used as amulets.

magical (maj'ik-ál), a. [< magic + -al.] Same as magic. [The difference between magic and magical, as in most other cases of adjectives in -ic and -ical, is largely rhythmical.]

They beheld unveiled the magical shield of your Arctura.
Dryden.

I'll humbly signify what in his name,
That magical word of war, we have effected.
Shak., A and C, III. 1. 31.

Laws have no magical, no supernatural virtue. . . . Laws do not act like Aladdin's lamp or Prince Ahmed's apple.
Macaulay, Essay, II. 97.

Egypt and Babylon . . . were the chief sources whence the world learnt what may be called the higher branches of occult science, and from the historical point of view the magical rites and beliefs of other ancient Eastern nations, such as Asia Minor and India, are of little importance.
E. B. Tyler, Lucy, Brit., XV. 201.

magically (maj'ik-ál-i), adv. In a magical manner; by or as if by magic.

magician (maj'ish-án), n. [< ML. magiceus, OP. and P. magiceus, < ML. as if 'magiceanus, < magice, magic; see magic.] 1. One of the Magi or priestly caste of ancient Persia.

It is confessed by all of understanding, that a magician (according to the Persian word) is neither than divinator, neither interpreter, a studious observer and expounder of divine things.
Judson, Hist. World I. 21. 2.

Therefore made I a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me. . . . Then came in the magicians, the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers.
Dan. iv. 7.

2. One skilled in magic; a wizard; an enchantment; a conjurer.

I have, since I was three year old, conversed with a magician, most profound in his art and yet not damnable.
Shak., As you like it, v. 2. 68.

magic-tree (maj'ik-tree), n. A beautiful shrub, Cassia burdula (natural order Polemoniaceae), of Peru, formerly used by the native Indians for the decoration of their houses on feast days.

magilp (mag'el-p'), n. [Also magelp, magilph, magelp, magulph, magelpup, magilph, magilph, magulph; said to be from a proper name.] In painting, a vehicle made of oil of turpentine and pale drying oil in equal proportions. These ingredients gelatinize and when mixed with all colors give them a certain body and a pulpy transparency. Magilp may be made also of linseed drying oil and mastic varnish, or of simple linseed oil and sugar of lead or of boiled oil mastic varnish, and a little sugar of lead. Also spelled magelp.

magilp (mag'el-p'), v. t. To reduce to the consistency of magilp.

If it pure color is well mixed with the oil colour, it magilps it sufficiently to hold the colour until it sets.
W. Bishop, Receipts, 1st ser., p. 421.

Magilus (maj'í-lus), n. [NL.] A remarkable genus of gastric tools of the family Coralliophiliidae, inquiline upon coral.

The shells when young are regularly apical but grow with the coral into irregular tubes, the older parts on which are left by the mollusk to become filled with solid deposits of calcareous matter. The species is named M. antiquus, and may attain a length of 2 or 3 feet.

Magiam (má'jiz-án), n. [= F. magisme; as Magr, Magm, + -ism.] The body of philosophy or doctrines of the Persian Magi; same as Magism.

Chaldeism and Magiam appear . . . mixed up together.
H. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 88.

magister (maj'is-ter), n. [< L. magister, a master, chief, head, superior, director, teacher, etc.; hence ult. F. magist and master, q. v.] Master; sir; an appellation given in the middle ages to persons of scientific or literary distinction, equivalent to the modern title of doctor. It is still used in Latin forms of various degrees. (See below.) In the early church it was given as a title to bishops and presbyters, in distinction from ministers or members of the lower orders.

I'm Magister — yes, Doctor — right.
I'm cleverer, true, than those tops of doctors, Doctors and Magisters, Scribes and Preceptors.
Goethe, Faust, I. 1 (tr. by S. Taylor).

Artium Magister, Master of Arts: a degree bestowed by universities and colleges, following the degree of Artium Baccalaureus or A. B. Also Magister Artium (M. A.). See A. M. — Magister ceremoniarum, master of the ceremonies. — Magister Disciplina, an officer in the Church of Spain, about the fifth century, appointed to take charge of those children who were dedicated to the church at an early age and placed in a bishop's household for instruction in morals and in the rules of the church. The officer who had supervision of children educated in monasteries bore the same title. — Magister Sacri Palatii, in the Aea, (eth. CA.), the incumbent of an office created early in the thirteenth century by Pope Innocent III. for the religious instruction of the employees of the pope, cardinals, and other Roman Catholic authorities living in Rome. The promoter and first holder of the office was St. Dominic, and later incumbents have been Dominicans. The duties and privileges of the office were gradually increased until it became one of very considerable importance. Among its privileges are that of conferring the degree of doctor in theology and philosophy and that of licensing books for publication.

magisteria, n. Plural of magisterium.

magisterial (maj-is-ter'í-ál), a. [< L. magisterium, the office of a chief, president, master, director, teacher, etc. (see magistry), + -al.]

1. Of or pertaining to a master; such as befits a master; authoritative; hence, lofty; arrogant; imperious; domineering.

Those who have fairly and truly examin'd, and another by got past doubt in all the doctrines they profess and govern themselves by. . . . are so few in number, and find so little reason to be magisterial in their opinions, that nothing insolent and imperious is to be expected from them.
Locke, Human Understanding, IV. xvi. 4.

The Squire is there
In his large arm-chair,
Leaning back with a grave magisterial air.
Barnes, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 172.

2. Of or belonging to a magistrate or his office; of the rank of a magistrate.

Acanthe here,
When magisterial duties from his home
Her father call'd, had entertain'd the guest.
Glover, Athensaid, xv.

3. In chem., pertaining to magistry. — Magisterial district. See district, 1. — SYN. 1. Authoritative, Magisterial, Imperious, Arrogant, Domineering, Superior, Dictatorial, Presumptive, official, grand, haughty, lofty, oracular. Authoritative is rarely used in a bad sense. Magisterial, in the sense of having the manner of a master or magistrate, generally indicates the overbearing of that manner. Magisterial pomp and gravity. Domineering reaches some what more deeply into the character; the domineering man insists strenuously upon the correctness of his own opinions, and, being unable to see how others can fail to believe with him, dictatorially presses upon them his opinions as true without argument, while he tends also to blame and overbear those who venture to express dissent. (See confident.) Arrogant implies the assumption of more than due authority from an overestimate of one's importance. (See arrogance.) Domineering, superior, and dictatorial apply to the assertion of one's own will over those of others in the attempt to rule. Domineering suggests unfitness or lack of authority to rule, with an insulting, boasting, or bullying manner. Imperious contains most of the real power of the will, suggesting a lofty or hardly determinable to be obeyed. Dictatorial implies, on the one hand, a disposition to rule, and, on the other, a sharp insistence upon having one's orders accepted or carried out. Presumptive shuts off discussion; a presumptive command or denial is one that must be obeyed or accepted in the letter and without debate; it is positive, absolute, and often immediate.

magisteriality (maj-is-ter'í-ál'-i-ti), n. [< magisterial + -ity.] Magisterial character or administration; domination.

When these statutes were first in the state or magisteriality thereof, they were severely put in practice.
Fuller, Church Hist., IX. iv. 11. (Dana.)

magisterially (maj-is-ter'í-ál'-i), adv. In a magisterial manner; in the manner of a master or a magistrate; with the air of a master or the authority of a magistrate.

magisterialness (maj-is-ter'í-ál'-ness), n. The character of being magisterial, in any sense of that word.

magisterium (maj-is-ter'í-um), n.; pl. magisteria (-í-á). [L.: see magistry.] 1. [< alchemy; a magistral], the philosopher's stone.

This is the day I am to perfect for him
The magisterium, our great work, the stone.
R. Jones, Alchemist, I. 1.

2. An authoritative statement or doctrine; a magistry.

Great importance is attached to what is called "the consensus of theologians" and the "ordinary magisterium or teaching of the Church."
New York, Nineteenth Century, XXII. 41.

magistry (maj'is-ter-í), n.; pl. magisteria (-í-á). [Formerly also, erroneously, magistery;

Magilus antiquus, natural size.

magistry (maj'is-tri-ē), n. [Fr. magistrie = Sp. Pg. It. magisterio, CL. magisterium, the office of a master, chief, director, president, etc., in ML. a magistrarium, CL. magister, a master, chief, director, president, etc.; see magister, master.] 1. A magisterial injunction; an authoritative mandate.

This law was not a magistry, but a mere command.

2. In alchemy, a magisterium or magistrat; in alchemy, one of various extracts or preparations, especially magisterium bismuthi, a precipitate formed when water is added to a solution of bismuth in nitric acid. See the quotations from Boyle and Berthollet.

No that hath had Water turned to Ashes hath the Magistry, and the true Philosophers Stone.

Howell, Letters, I. vi. 41.

Although magistry be a term variously enough employed by chemists, and particularly used by Paracelsus to signify very different things, yet the best notion I have of it . . . is, that it is a preparation whereby there is not an analysis made of the body assigned, nor an extraction of this or that principle, but the whole or very near the whole body, by the help of some addition, greater or less, is turned into a body of another kind.

Boyle, Works, I. 107.

Magisteria seem to have been thus called by the ancient chemists as denoting the capital production or masterpiece of their art. They pretend that they are able to take any simple body, and without any change of its weight or division of its parts, alter it into another exceedingly different from the former, and usually liquid, for instance, to reduce an ounce of gold into a fluid of the same weight, by fire alone, without the addition of any other matter.

Berthollet, Chemistry (tr. by Shaw 1803), I. 171.

3. Any kind of medicine or remedial agency asserted to be of exceptional efficacy.

magistracy (maj'is-trā-si), n. [CL. magistratus + -cy.] 1. The office or dignity of a magistrate.

In all tyrannical governments the supreme magistracy, or the right both of making and of enforcing the laws, is vested in one and the same man, or one and the same body of men.

Blackstone, Com., I. 11.

We have no power to make laws, to erect all sorts of magistracies, to create a judicial, parson.

Wentworth, Hist. New England II. 541.

2. The body of magistrates.

That enlightened, eloquent, sage and profound body the Magistracy of London.

Dickens, Sketches Series VII.

magistral (maj'is-trā-l), a. [Fr. Sp. Pg. magistral = It. magistrale, CL. magistralis, of or belonging to a master or teacher, magister, a master, teacher, etc.; see magister, master.] 1. a. 1. Belonging to a master or magistrat; magisterial; authoritative.

Your assertion of the original of our House of Burgs, I justly say is more magistral than true.

Sp. Hall, Ans. to Apol. for Inconstancy 47.

2. Having sovereign remedial qualities.

More comforting

Than all your updates, jalap, squam,

Magistral clysters.

B. Jonson, Volpone, I. 1.

Let it be some magistral opiate

Beaumont, Hist. Life and Death, p. 20.

3. In phar., prescribed or prepared for the occasion; applied to medicines which are not kept prepared or made up. Magistral line see II. 1. — Magistral method, a self-director's method of teaching established truth.

The most real diversity of method is of method referred to two, and method referred to progress, where the one may be termed magistral, and the other of probation.

Beaumont, Advancement of Learning, II.

II. a. 1. In alchemy and old med., a sovereign medicine or remedy.

I find a vast chain of medicines, a confusion of receipts and magistralia, amongst writers, appropriated to this disease.

Burton, Anal. of Med. p. 262.

2. In fort., the guiding line from which the position of the other lines or works is determined. In field-fortification this line is the interior crest-line. In permanent fortification it is usually the line of the tops of the escarp of each wall. Farro — Magistral line fully called magistral line.

3. An officer in cathedral and collegiate churches and royal chapels in Spain, generally a canon whose duty it was to preach a certain course of sermons. — 4. (Sp. prom. ma-lis-trā-l). Copper pyrites or other sulphureted ores of copper roasted at a carefully regulated temperature with free access of air. It is used in the Mexican "patio process" (which see, under process).

magistrale (maj'is-trā-l), a. [It. = Fr. magistral.] See magistral.

magistrality (maj'is-trā-l'i-ti), n. [CL. magistralis + -ty.] Magistral character, quality, or teaching; magisterial air or authority.

Those who seek truth, and not magistrality.

Beaumont, Advancement of Learning, II.

magistrally (maj'is-trā-l'i), adv. Authoritatively; magisterially. Perdona, Pilgrimage, p. 503.

magistrand (maj'is-trānd'), n. [CL. magistrandus, grand of magistrature, magistrature, perform the office of a director or chief, rule, command, ML. also make a master (in arts), confer the degree of master upon, CL. magister, a master; see magister, master.] A university student in the fourth year of his arts course, after which he may proceed to graduation; a designation still in use in Aberdeen, formerly also in other Scottish universities.

magistrate (maj'is-trā-t'), n. [ME. magistrat, OF. magistrat, F. magistrat, a town council, a magistrate, = Sp. Pg. magistral = It. magistrato, council, court, tribunal, magistracy, also a magistrate, CL. magistratus, the office of a chief, director, president, etc., a magistrate, a magistrate, a master, chief, director, etc.; see magister, master.] 1. Magistracy.

Verres thus thrust his head not far beneath with as many perils as those mightiest sufferer that those swollen herds the magistrat with (C) Decret.

Chapman, Boethius, III. p. 106.

2. An administrator of the law; one who possesses jurisdiction or executive authority in matters of civil government; an executive or judicial officer holding the power of decision and disposal in regard to subjects within his competence; as, a king is the first magistrate of a monarchy; in the United States the President is often called the chief magistrate, the magistrates of a state or city; civil or judicial magistrates, but the word is more particularly applied to subordinate officers to whom some part of executive judicial power is committed or delegated.

We acknowledge that the civil magistrate creates an authority of goods giving, and ought to be obeyed as his viceregent.

Milton, Church Government, I. 3.

3. Specifically, a minor judicial officer; a justice of the peace, or a police justice; in Scotland, a provost or a baillie of a burgh; as, to be brought before the bar of the local magistrate.

— 4. In the New Testament, a Roman military governor or prefect. — Chief magistrate see Chief magistrate.

Committing magistrate see Committing magistrate. Curule magistrate see Curule. Stipendiary magistrates see Stipendiary.

magistratic (maj'is-trā-t'ik), a. [CL. magistraticus + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a magistrate; having the authority of a magistrate. See Taylor (F), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 169.

magistratral (maj'is-trā-t'ral), a. [CL. magistratralis + -al.] Same as magistratic.

magistrature (maj'is-trā-t'ur), n. [Fr. magistrature = Sp. Pg. It. magistratura, = ML. magistratura, CL. magistratus, a magistrate, see magistrate.] 1. Magistracy. — 2. Administration of law; civil government.

The war which a great people was waging for the idea of nationality and orderly magistrature.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 143.

mag-loon (maj'lo-n), n. The speckled loon or red-throated diver, Colaptes septentrionalis (Prov. Eng.).

magma (mag'na), n. [ML. (Gr. μάγμα, a kneaded mass, a calve, CL. μάγμα, a kneaded mass, see magma.] 1. Any crude mixture, especially of organic matters, in the form of a thick paste. — 2. In med. (a) The thick residuum obtained after subjecting certain substances to pressure to extract the fluid parts. (b) The grounds which remain after treating a substance with water, alcohol, or any other menstruum. (c) A saline of a certain degree of concentration. See Duglison. — 3. A confection. — 4. In petrol., the ground-mass or base of a rock; that part which is amorphous or which has no decidedly individualized contour, so far as can be made out from examination of thin sections with the aid of a microscope. It is in such an amorphous homogeneous magma or ground mass that the crystalline elements of many rocks are embedded. The term magma is also frequently used to designate molten or plastic material lying beneath the surface, which it is desirable to speak of with all possible indication of its actual character in discussing the phenomena of volcanism, metamorphism, etc.

Carrying out this idea still further, in describing the process of the theory that beneath the earth's crust there exist two magmas, the upper consisting of light and material the lower of heavy basic rocks, and we suppose that by the varying intensity of the volcanic forces we may have sometimes one or the other magma erupted and sometimes various mixtures of the two.

Judd, Volcanism, p. 201.

Magma-basalt see Volcanism.

magmatic (mag'nat'ik), a. [CL. magmaticus + -ic.] Belonging or related to the magma or to the material of which the igneous rocks are formed while this is yet in the unconsolidated or unindividualized condition. magmoid (mag'na'id), a. In bot., resembling an alga, consisting of spherical green cells. (See Leighton).

magna, a. Plural of magnum, 2. Magna Charta (mag'na kār'tā), n. See charta. magnalia (mag'na-l'i-ā), n. pl. [CL. magnalia, great things, CL. magnus, great; see magnificence, magnus.] Something great; a great or striking deed or feat.

It might be one of God's magnalia to perfect his own praise out of the weakness and imperfection of the organ.

For Tupper, Works (ed. 1888), II. 61.

magnality (mag'na-l'i-ti), n. [CL. magnalia, in pl. magnalia, great things, CL. magnus, great; see magnificence, magnus.] Something great; a great or striking deed or feat.

Although perhaps too greatly of magnanimity, we are apt to make but favourable comparisons concerning welcome truths and much desired virtues.

See T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 2.

magnanerie (man'yan-er-i), n. [F. magnanerie, a silk-worm; cf. magnanerie, a breeder of silk-worms.] 1. An establishment for the commercial rearing of silk-worms.

The cure proposed by Pasteur was simply to take care that the stock whence grain was obtained should be healthy, and the offspring would then be healthy also. Small quantities reared apart from the ordinary magnanerie, for the production of grain alone, were recommended.

Revue, Med., 2. 11. 24.

2. The art or practice of rearing or breeding silk-worms.

magnanimity (mag'na-nim'i-ti), n. [CL. magnanimus = F. magnanimité = Sp. magnanimidad = It. magnanimità, = CL. magnanimus, great-heartedness, CL. magnanimus, great-heartedness; see magnanimous.] The quality of being magnanimous; greatness of mind or heart; elevation or dignity of soul; the habit of feeling and acting worthily under all circumstances; high-mindedness; intrinsic nobility. In its earlier use the word implies especially high courage and noble steadfastness of purpose; in its later use, high-minded generosity.

Magnanimity is doubtless consistent in contempt of pain, in contempt of death, and in the mortification of the flesh when one lives.

Beaumont, Spelling, I. 100.

The favorite example of magnanimity among the Romans was Fabius Maximus, who, amidst the provocations of the enemy and the impositions of his countrymen, declined to give battle till he saw how he could do so successfully.

Flaming, Words, Pith.

But Tennyson think his interest, You find his magnanimity the while.

See many, King and Book, II. 106.

— Syn. High-mindedness, disinterestedness. See table. magnanimous (mag'na-nim'us), a. [Fr. magnanime = Sp. magnánimo = It. magnanimo, = CL. magnanimus, great-hearted, having a great or lofty soul, CL. magnus, great (see magnus), + animus, soul, mind; see animus.] Cf. magnanimous.] 1. Great of mind or heart; of high and steadfast courage; elevated in soul or in sentiment; high-minded; raised above what is low, mean, or ungenerous. — 2. Distinguished by greatness of mind or heart; exhibiting nobleness of soul; liberal and honorable; unselfish.

The magnanimous frankness of a man who had done great things and who could well afford to acknowledge some deficiencies.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., VII.

— Syn. Generous (see table), high-minded, great-souled, chivalrous.

magnanimously (mag'na-nim'us-ly), adv. In a magnanimous manner; with magnanimity. magnate (mag'nat'), n. [Fr. magnat = Sp. Pg. It. magnate, = CL. magnas (magnus), pl. magnates, also magnatus, pl. magnati, a great person, a nobleman, in ML. and esp. with ref. to the nobility forming the national representation of Hungary and Poland, CL. magnus, great; see magnitude, magnus.] 1. A person of rank; a noble or grandee; a person of note or distinction in any sphere; as, a railroad magnate.

The greatest magnates were content to serve in the civil or military and administrative, rather than to act up to their position constitutionally as members of a great estate in parliament.

Macaulay, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 242.

Specifically — 2. One of the members of the upper house of the Diet of Hungary, called the House of Lords of Magnates. It comprises certain hereditary peers, high state dignitaries and ecclesiastics, life peers, etc.

magne-crystalline (mag'ne-kris-tal'ik), a. [Fr. see for magneto-crystalline, CL. magnat + crystalline.]

+ -ic.] Pertaining to the effect of a magnet upon a crystallized body. Faraday called the magnetic force whose action upon crystals was determined by their molecular structure magnetic crystalline force. Typical shows that in paramagnetic crystals the axis (magnetic crystalline axis) acts usually, in diamagnetic crystals, equatorially.

The first observations of the magnetic crystalline complex were made by Plücker . . . Shortly after Plücker's first results were published, Faraday discovered the magnetic crystalline action of crystallized bismuth.

Chrysol. Enry. Brit., 85, 24

magneli, n. A Middle English variant of magnon.

magnesia (mag-ne'si-ä), n. [ME. magnesia (def. 1); < ML. magnesia, a mineral said to be brought from Magnesia; fem. of Magnesia, adj., pertaining to Magnesia; < Magnesia, Gr. Μαγνησία, a district in Thessaly (also the name of the mine of it in Asia Minor); see magnet. In def. 2: F. magnésie = Sp. Pg. It. magnesia, NL. magnesia, magnesia (magnesium oxide), so called from a supposed relation to magnesium (formerly called magnesium).] 1. A mineral said to be brought from Magnesia. 2. Magnesium oxide (MgO), a white tasteless substance having a feeble alkaline reaction. Its specific gravity varies from 3.07 to 3.61. It is nearly insoluble in water, and scarcely fuses at the temperature of the oxyhydrogen flame. It is prepared by the ignition of any magnesium salt of a volatile acid. Magnesia is used in medicine as an antacid and mild cathartic, and in the arts for preparing magnesium salts. Magnesia alba, the magnesia of the shops, is a hydrated magnesium carbonate. Calcined magnesia is pure magnesia prepared by strongly heating the carbonate. Magnesia mica. Same as bottle.

Magnesian (mag-ne'si-än), a. [< L. Magnesianus, < Gr. Μαγνησιος, Magnesian (see def.), + -an.] Of or pertaining to Magnesia, an ancient city of Asia Minor, near Miletus, or to a town of the same name in ancient Lydia, or to a district so called in Thessaly.

magnesian (mag-ne'si-än), a. [< magnesia + -an.] Pertaining to magnesia or having its qualities; containing or resembling magnesia. Magnesian limestone. See limestone.

magnetic (mag-ne'tik), a. [< magnesium + -ic.] Of or pertaining to magnesium.

The tendency to fuse on the part of the mixture is due to the magnetic chloride. Tr. Diet., 15, 543 magnesiiferite (mag-ne'si-ä fer'it), n. [< NL. magnesium + L. ferrum, iron.] An oxide of magnesium and iron, belonging to the spinel group, which has been observed at Vesuvius. Also magnesiiferite.

magnesite (mag-ne'sit), n. [< magnesium + -ite.] 1. Native magnesium carbonate, a mineral occurring in white compact masses, less often in rhombohedral crystals. It belongs to the calcite group.—2. The hydrated magnesium silicate usually called saponite or meerschaum.

magnesium (mag-ne'si-üm), n. [NL.; in def. 1, < Gr. Μαγνησιος, see adhe, magnet; in def. 2, < magnesium.] 1. Manganese.—2. Chemical symbol, Mg; atomic weight, 24.30. The metallic base of the widely distributed alkaline earth magnesia, which in various combinations, and especially in the form of the double carbonate of lime and magnesia, is one of the most abundant of the materials which make up the earth's crust. It is a metal of a brilliant silver white color, having a specific gravity of 1.75. It melts at a red heat, and boils at a temperature somewhat above that at which zinc volatilizes. When held in the flame of a candle it burns with a dazzling white light, which has been seen at sea at a distance of 36 miles. Magnesium was first prepared in a pure state by Bussy, that which had been previously obtained by Davy was impure and not a coherent metal. It is now manufactured on a large scale at various places, especially near Manchester in England, and is pressed when in a semi-solid state into wire, and then flattened into ribbon, in which form it is generally sold. It is used in taking photographs in places into which the sunlight does not penetrate, in signaling for naval and military purposes, and in pyrotechny, as well as in some operations connected with chemical analysis. The magnesium combinations are widely distributed in nature. From 5 to 6 per cent. of the solid material held in solution by the water of the ocean is magnesium sulphate, and from 8 to 11 per cent. magnesium chloride. Next to sodium chlorate, and sulphuric acid, magnesium is the most abundant in solution in the ocean. It is, with rare exceptions (as in the case of the genus Sepioida), not taken from the ocean by animal life, differing greatly in this respect from lime. Magnesium carbonate, in combination with calcium carbonate, forming dolomite, occurs in enormous quantities among the stratified formations. Beds made up of almost chemically pure dolomite hundreds of feet thick cover thousands of square miles in the valley of the upper Mississippi. Magnesium carbonate also occurs in great abundance, mixed in varying proportions with the calcium carbonate in much of the rock designated as marble and limestone, which when this fact becomes known by chemical analysis are designated dolomitic. Magnesia also plays the part of base in great numbers of silicates, especially in talc, mica, hornblende, serpentine, olivine, and the pyroxenes and hornblendes. Magnesian silicates form an important part of numerous metaclasses. The pure magnesium carbonate (magnesite) occurs in various localities, but in by no means an abundant mineral. The non-silicated soluble compounds of magnesium are also of rather rare occurrence in nature, but are found in considerable quantity in a few localities, among which that in the vicinity of Staßfurt in Prussia is economically of by far the greatest importance. The combinations found there are kinite, carnallite, and bischofite. (See these words.) Both magnesium sulphate and magnesium chloride occur in the water of many mineral springs as well as in that of the ocean. The bones of animals and the seeds of various cereals contain a small amount of magnesium phosphate, and the salt is also found in gum. Magnesian salts are used to a limited extent in medicine, especially the sulphate (Epsom salts), they are also used in dressing cotton goods and in dyeing, but, in the whole, the economic importance of the combinations of magnesium, considering their abundance and the cheapness with which they could be furnished in large quantity, is exceedingly small.

magnesium-lamp (mag-ne'si-üm-lamp), n. A lamp in which magnesium is burned for the purpose of illumination. Such lamps are of various types, being adapted for the combustion of the metal in the form of a wire or ribbon or in a pulverized state.

magnes-stonet, n. [Fr. L. magnes lapis, Gr. Μαγνης λίθος; see magnet.] A magnet.

On another side an hideous rock is plight
Of mighty Magnes-stonet. Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 4.

As if the sight of the enemy had been a magnestonet to his courage, he could not contain himself.

magnet (mag-net), n. [< ME. magnete = D. magnet = MLG. magnus, magne, Gr. μαγνης = Dan. Sw. magnet = OF. magnēt, magnet (the mod. F. term is aimant; see aimant, aimant) = Sp. Pg. It. magnete, < L. magnēs (magnet) (with or without lapis, stone), a magnet, < Gr. μαγνης, also μαγνητα, prop. adj., Μαγνητα, Μαγνητα, Μαγνητα, Μαγνητα (see, adhe), a magnet, lit. stone of Magnesia, < Μαγνητα (Μαγνητα), also Μαγνητα, an inhabitant of Magnesia, < Μαγνητα, Μαγνητα, a district in Thessaly, where the magnet or magnetic iron ore appar. first came to notice.] A body which possesses the property of attracting fragments of iron or steel, and which, when freely suspended, tends, under the action of the earth, to take a certain definite position, pointing approximately north and south. The lodestone, a variety of the mineral magnetite, or the native magnetic oxide of iron (Fe₃O₄), is a natural magnet, but the properties of the magnet are best shown by an artificial magnet (see below) which has commonly the form of a straight bar or that of a horseshoe. When a bar-magnet is dipped into iron filings it is found that they adhere most strongly at the extremities of the bar (which are called the poles of the magnet), and not at all along the line midway between them. Strictly speaking, however, except in the case of a long thin magnet, the poles are not exactly at the ends. The middle line is called the neutral line or equator of the magnet, the straight line joining the poles is the axis of the magnet, or magnetic axis. A magnetic bar may abnormally have one or more intermediate points of maximum attraction, which are then called consequent poles. Again, if a magnetic needle is suspended at its center of gravity so as to be entirely free to turn, it is found that in general it places itself with its axis in a direction nearly north and south, and with one end inclining downward. The pole which is directed toward the north is called the north or north-seeking pole, also the buried pole or red pole, or marked end of the needle, the other the south, south-seeking, neutral, repeller, or blue pole or unmarked end. It is found, further, that the like poles of two magnets repel and unlike poles attract each other. If a magnet is broken into halves, each half is found to be a complete magnet with a north and a south pole, and this is true no matter how often the process of division is repeated. On this and other more fundamental grounds, it is concluded that the magnetic polarity belongs to each molecule throughout the bar, and the maximum attraction observed near the ends is only the resultant effect of all these individual forces. (See magnetism.) A magnetic substance is one which may be attracted by a magnet, but has not the property of attracting other magnetic substances, and therefore has no polarity. Soft iron is a magnetic substance, as is also most magnetic the lodestone variety being exceptional. A permanent magnet is one which retains its magnetism after the magnetic influence, or force below, ceases to act. Steel and the lodestone have this property, on account of their high degree of coercive force. (See coercive.) Soft iron has very little coercive force, and accordingly its power of retaining magnetism is small. An artificial magnet (as a compass needle) made by contact with other magnets, and the methods employed are described as single touch, double touch, and separate touch, according to the way in which the substance to be magnetized is touched by the magnets. Such a magnet may also be made of magnetic induction without actual contact. (See induction, F.) Again, a magnet may be made by passing a current of electricity through a wire coiled about the bar to be magnetized; this is called an electromagnet (which see). By this means magnets of very great strength may be made. They have usually a residual force, and the bar is of soft iron, so that it retains its magnetism only so long as the current is passing. The earth may be considered as a huge magnet, whose poles are situated in the neighborhood of the geographical poles, though not coinciding with them; the north magnetic pole of the earth corresponds in polarity to the south-seeking pole of a magnetic needle. The action of the earth causes freely suspended needle to set in a plane called the magnetic meridian, which in general makes an angle east or west of the geographical meridian (see declination), and with one pole (in the northern hemisphere, the north-seeking pole) inclined downward (see dip of the needle, under dip). The earth's magnetic force also serves to induce magnetism in masses of iron (lying in or near the magnetic meridian). An iron ship is thus magnetized in the course of its construction. Similarly, iron columns, etc., are often found to be feebly magnetic. Magnetic properties belong also to some other compounds of iron besides the magnetic oxide, as pyrrhotite or magnetic pyrites (FeS₂), and to some varieties of the native arsenic, hematite (Fe₂O₃), also to the magnetic metals nickel, cobalt, chromium, and manganese. Some varieties of platinum are strongly magnetic, and occasionally masses have polarity also, but this may be due to the large percentage of iron present, although all so-called large-platinum does not show this property. Finally, it is found that a powerful electromagnetic current exerts an effect on all substances, in accordance with which they are divided into the two groups paramagnetic and diamagnetic (this is explained under diamagnetism).

Compound magnet. Same as magnetic battery. Deflecting-magnet, a magnet used for deflecting a magnetic needle; often attached to a galvanometer for the purpose of fixing the zero of the needle in a certain position, or for altering the sensitiveness of the needle by changing the magnetic field. Also called zero magnet, deflecting magnet, and deflector. Horseshoe magnet, a magnet having a form somewhat resembling a horseshoe (see figure), being bent so that the two poles are brought near together, and hence can act at the same time upon the keeper or armature. A horseshoe electromagnet commonly consists of two bobbin side by side, whose cores are connected at one end by a piece of soft iron.—Moment of a magnet. See moment. Permanent magnet. See the definition. Portative force of a magnet, the maximum weight which a magnet can support.—Receiving-magnet. Same as relay magnet. Relay magnet, or relay, is a sensitive electromagnetic receiving instrument used to close a circuit in the receiving station, which contains a battery and a less sensitive receiving instrument, such as a sounder or a register; also used to transmit a message over another section of the line. See transmission. Saturated magnet. See magnetism. Solenoidal magnet, a long and thin bar magnet, uniformly magnetized, whose poles are at or very near the ends. In such a magnet the distribution of the magnetism is said to be solenoidal, in distinction from the lamellar distribution of a magnetic shell (which see, under magnetic).—To arm a magnet. See arm.—To make the magnet. See make.

Magnetic (mag-ne'tik), a. and n. [= F. magnétique = Sp. magnético = Pg. It. magnetico (cf. D. Gr. μαγνητικός = Dan. Sw. magnetisk), < NL. magneticeus (Gr. μαγνητικός), of a magnet, < L. magnēs (magnet), < Gr. μαγνης (mag-net), a magnet; see magnet.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the magnet or to magnetism; possessing the properties of the magnet; as, a magnetic bar of iron; a magnetic needle.

The magnetic axis of the magnet is the line joining the two poles, and the direction of the magnetic axis is reckoned from the negative pole towards the positive one.

Athenaeum, tr. of Macart and Joubert, I. 20.

2. Pertaining to the earth's magnetism; as, the magnetic north; the magnetic meridian. See phrases below.—3. Having properties analogous to those of the magnet; attractive; winning.

Doubtless there is a certain attraction and magnetic force betwixt the religion and the ministerial forms thereof.
Milton, Church-Government, l. 1.

Magnetic axis. See magnet. Magnetic armature. See armature. Magnetic battery, a kind of battery formed of several magnets (usually horseshoe magnets) combined together, with all their poles similarly disposed. Also called a magnetic magazine or a compound magnet. Magnetic cohesion. See cohesion. Magnetic curves, the name given to those curves in which an infinite number of very minute needles would arrange themselves when placed round a magnet and at liberty to move round an axis. As electric telegraph, a telegraph in which the currents are produced by magneto-electric machines, in contradistinction to telegraphs in which voltaic batteries are used.

magneto-electrical (mag-ne-to-élek-trí-kul), a. Same as magneto-electric.

magneto-electricity (mag-ne-to-élek-trí-sí-ti), n. 1. Electricity evolved by the action of magnets. — 2. That branch of science which treats of phenomena in which the principles of both magnetism and electricity are involved. See electromagnetism.

magnetogram (mag-net-ó-grá-m), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. gramma, a writing; see gram.] The automatic record of the movements of the magnetic needles in an observatory. Nature, XXXVIII, 256.

magnetograph (mag-net-ó-gráf), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. graphō, write; see gram.] 1. A magnetometer arranged to give an automatic and continuous record of the changes in position of the magnet under the influence of the earth. This is accomplished by the reflection of a spot of light from a mirror attached to the magnet on to a drum of sensitized paper turned by clockwork. 2. The record of a magnetometer; a magnetogram.

magneto-instrument (mag-ne-to-in-stró-mént), n. Same as magneto.

magnetology (mag-ne-tol-ó-jí), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. logos, a word; see logy.] A treatise on the magnet and magnetism; the science of magnetism.

magneto-machine (mag-ne-to-má-shén), n. Same as magneto. Lassler, Mod. High Explosives, p. 177.

magnetometer (mag-ne-tom-é-tér), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. metron, a measure; see meter.] An instrument used to measure magnetic forces or the strength of a magnetic field, especially one used to measure the intensity of the earth's magnetic force at any place. Magnetometers are arranged to measure the horizontal and vertical components of this force, from which its total intensity and direction are calculated. Bislar magnetometer. See bislar.

magnetometric (mag-ne-to-met-í-rik), a. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. metron, a measure; see meter.] Pertaining to or employed in the measurement of magnetic forces; obtained by means of a magnetometer; as, magnetometric observations.

magnetometry (mag-ne-tom-é-trí), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. metron, a measure; see meter.] The measurement of the strength of a magnet, or, more strictly, of a magnetic field; especially, the measurement of the earth's magnetic force; the use of a magnetometer.

magnetomotive (mag-ne-to-mot-iv), a. Producing active magnetic effects. Magnetomotive force, the magnetizing force or influence to which a magnetic substance is subjected in a magnetic field; the quantity which divided by the magnetic resistance gives the intensity of magnetization. Analogous to electromotive force.

magneto-optic (mag-ne-to-op-tík), a. Pertaining to magneto-optics.

magneto-optics (mag-ne-tó-op-tí-kal), n. That branch of physics which considers the modifying action of a magnet upon light. The most important effect is the rotation of the plane of polarization of a light-ray on passing through a transparent body in a powerful magnetic field. Since electromagnets are employed in these experiments, this subject is mainly included under the more general head of electro-optics.

magnetophone (mag-net-ó-fón), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. phōnē, a sound; see phone.] An apparatus devised by H. S. Carhart, consisting essentially of a horseshoe magnet, in front of which is a disk of sheet-iron pierced with a number of holes, and on the other side a small induction-coil in circuit with a telephone. Upon rotating the disk, a clear musical note is heard in the telephone, the pitch rising as the rapidity of rotation is increased. This is explained by the intermittent action of the magnet upon the core of the coil, caused by the presence of the rotating perforated disk.

magneto-pointer (mag-ne-to-póin-tér), n. The index of a magneto-electric dial-telegraph.

magneto-printer (mag-ne-to-prín-tér), n. A printing telegraph in which a magneto-electric machine is the working-power. More fully called magneto-printing telegraph. E. D. Lockwood, Elect., Mag., and Teleg., p. 62.

magnetoscope (mag-net-ó-skóp), n. [Gr. magnētrios + Gr. skopos, a view; see scope.] 1. A person supposed to see, or a thing supposed to aid in seeing, by means of magnetism; a clairvoyant, or a clairvoyant's device. — 2. In physics, a contrivance for indicating the presence of magnetic force, but without measuring its intensity.

magneto-telegraph (mag-ne-tel-é-gráf), n. Same as magneto-electric telegraph; which see, under magneto-electric.

magneto-telephone (mag-ne-to-tel-é-fón), n. A telephone in which variations in the strength of a magnet produce, or are produced by, undulatory currents in a coil of wire surrounding either the whole or a part of the magnet and forming part of the telephone circuit. See telephone.

magneto-transmitter (mag-ne-to-tráns-mít-ér), n. 1. In telephony, a magneto-telephone used to transmit speech or other sounds. — 2. In telegraphy, a magneto-electric machine used to produce the telegraphic currents.

magnifiable (mag-ní-fi-á-bil), a. [Gr. magnify + Gr. able.] 1. Capable of being magnified or enlarged. — 2. Worthy to be magnified or extolled.

Number, though wonderful in itself, and sufficiently magnifiable from its demonstrable affection hath yet received adfections from the multiplying comets of men. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv, 12.

magnific (mag-ní-fík), a. [Formerly also magnifique; Fr. magnifique = Sp. magnifico = It. magnifico, Gr. magniferos, great in deeds or sentiments, noble, high-minded, Gr. magnus, great (see magnus, magnitude), + facere, do; see fact.] Making great or illustrious; glorifying or gloriously; splendid; magnificent. [It. magnifico.]

O parent! these are thy magnific deeds. Madon, P. L., x, 364.

This King Henry VIII. at Bologna was victorious; In peace and warre, Magnifico, glorious, In his huge bounty he did oft expresse His liberality to have excess. John Taylor, Memorials of Monarchs.

Then the pillar'd dome magnific heav'd His ample roof. Thomson, Autumn, l. 135.

magnifical (mag-ní-fík-ál), a. [Gr. magnify + Gr. al.] Like a magnifico; same as magnifico.

His port & state is in manner as magnifical as the other afore-said ambassadors. Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 224.

magnifically (mag-ní-fík-ál-ly), adv. In a magnificent manner; with pomp or splendor. Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv, 9.

Magnificat (mag-ní-fík-át), n. [L. magnificat (3d pers. sing. pres. ind. act. of magnificare, magnify; see magnify), as used in the Vulgate, Luke i, 46: "Magnificat anima mea Dominum."] 1. The song or hymn of the Virgin Mary in Luke i, 46-55, beginning "My soul doth magnify the Lord." It is very similar to the song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii, 1-10) which has accordingly been called the Old Testament Magnificat. The Magnificat was in use in the Roman daily service of the Christian church as early as about A. D. 500. In the Greek church it is the ninth ode (canticle) at Vespers (laude), and is called the Canticle of the Theotokos. It was at first omitted from the American Prayer book, but was restored in 1928.

2. A musical setting of this hymn. Magnificat at matins, something out of place in allusion to the proper place of this canticle in the even song. The note is here all out of place. . . and so their note comes in like Magnificat at matins. Andrews, Sermons, v, 10. (Dances) magnificate (mag-ní-fík-át), v. t. [L. magnificare, pp. of magnificare, magnify; see magnify.] To magnify or extol. That wilt, oth My mistress his merit. B. Jonson, Volpone, v, 1.

magnification (mag-ní-fík-á-shún), n. [= OF. magnification, L. magnificationem, L. magnificare, magnify; see magnify.] 1. The act of magnifying or the state of being magnified or enlarged, as by a lens. Psychological magnification is not more absurd than physical, although the processes in the two cases must be materially different; but of course in no case is magnification possible without limit. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX, 48.

2. In optics, specifically, increase of visual power in respect of penetration as well as superficial enlargement, thus contrasting with amplification. Little is gained by expanding the image of an object from the ten to a hundred of an inch to an inch if there be not an equivalent resolution of hidden details. It is in this revealing quality which I shall call magnification, that our recent lenses so brilliantly excel. Holladay, Ibid. (Nature, XXX, 62).

3. The act of magnifying or extolling. Jer. Taylor. Magnificence (mag-ní-fí-sen-s), n. [ME. magnificence, OF. magnifiance = Sp. Pg. magnificencia = It. magnificenza, L. magnificencia, pp. of magnificare, magnify; see magnify.] 1. The state or condition of being magnificent; grandeur; of appearance or of character; splendor; brilliancy; as, the magnificence of a palace or of a possession; the magnificence of Shakespeare's genius.

The truly good government is not that which celebrates magnificence in a court, but that which diffuses happiness among a people. Mansfield, Memorials.

2. A high degree of generosity; munificence. Those heless laundres, gosses, and droppes, By our herdes favour, grace, and magnificence. Joseph of Arimathea (R. K. T. A.), p. 22.

The magnificent man must be liberal also; for the liberal man, too, will spend the right amount in the right manner; only, both the amount and the manner being right, magnificence is distinguished from liberality by greatness. Peters, tr. of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics.

3. A title of courtesy belonging of right to several high officers of ancient Rome, and also to the rector (rector magnificus), prorector, and chancellor of a German university, and to some other (German) officials; corresponding to lordship, highness, or eminence (with his or your prefixed). — Syn. 1. Pomp, éclat. See grand.

magnificency (mag-ní-fí-sen-sí), n.; pl. magnificencies (-síz). 1. Magnificence; grandeur. — 2. A magnificent thing; an instance or example of magnificence or grandeur. [Bare.] magnificent (mag-ní-fí-sen-t), a. [L. as if magnificens (t-s) (occurring in the compar. and superl. of magnificus, and its deriv. magnificencia; see magnific and magnificence), equiv. to magniferos, great in deeds or sentiment, noble, splendid, etc., Gr. magnus, great, + -ficus (t-s), an accom. form of -ficus (t-s), the reg. form in comp. of faciens (t-s), pp. of facere, do; see fact, facient.] 1. Great in deeds or action; especially, very liberal; munificent; generous; open-handed. Know, you court-lovers, A prince is never so magnificent As when he's sparing to enrich a few With the injuries of many. Mansfield, Emperor of the East, II, 1.

This canopy or arch of water I thought one of the most surprising magnificencies I had ever seen. Kedyn, Diary, May 21, 1644.

That little reward of virtue was ever magnificent. Alton, Hist. Eng., II.

2. Making a great show; possessing or pretending to greatness; stately; ostentatious. A letter from the magnificent Armado. Shak., L. L. L., I, i, 124.

3. Grand in appearance or character; exhibiting greatness; splendid; brilliant; of extraordinary excellence; as, a magnificent building or view; a magnificent victory or poem; magnificent conceptions. This was thought and called a magnificent answer. Byron, Child Harold, iv, 31, note.

4. Exhibiting greatness of size or extent; as, the preparations were upon a magnificent scale; a city of magnificent distances. Far distant he describes, Ascending by degrees magnificent Up to the wall of heaven, a structure high. Milton, P. L., III, 102.

— Syn. Superb, splendid, etc. (see grand); imposing, august, gorgeous.

magnificently (mag-ní-fí-sen-tí-ly), adv. In a magnificent manner; with magnificence; splendidly; brilliantly; gorgeously.

Magnificet (mag-ní-fí-sét), n. [L. magnificet, 3d pers. sing. pres. subj. of magnificare, magnify; see magnify.] A name of Mid-Lent Thursday, taken from the first word of the collect. Hampson, Medii Aevi Calendarium, II, 254.

magnifico (mag-ní-fí-kó), n. [It. magnifico, noble, great; see magnific.] 1. A title of courtesy formerly given to Venetian noblemen; hence, a grandee; a man of high rank or pretensions; a great man. The duke himself, and the magnificos Of greatest port, have all persuaded with him. Shak., M. of V., III, 1, 224.

2. A by-name for the rector of a German university, who is entitled to be addressed as your Magnificence. See magnificence, 3.

magnifier (mag-ní-fí-ér), n. 1. One who or that which magnifies or enlarges.

Mens hilares, requies, moderata dieta is a great magnifier of honest mirth. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 204.

2. Specifically, an optical instrument that magnifies; a convex lens, a concave mirror, or a combination of lenses or mirrors, which increases the apparent magnitude of bodies.

magnifiquet, a. An obsolete form of magnifico. magnify (mag-ní-fí), v. t.; pres. and pp. magnifies, magnifying. [ME. magnifikan, OF. magnifier, Fr. magnifier = Sp. Pg. magnificar, L. magnificare, make much of, esteem highly, praise highly, extol, magnify, Gr. magnify, great, + facere, make. Cf. magnific.] 1. To make greater; increase the size, amount, or extent of; enlarge; augment. [Bare in this literal sense.]

2. The wood of the above tree. It contains a rich reddish-brown color, beauty of grain, and susceptibility of polish with unusual smoothness, uniformity, freedom from warping, durability, and largeness of dimensions. On account of its condition, its use is restricted mainly to furniture-making, cabinet work, etc., often in the form of veneer. The quality of the timber varies with the conditions of its growth, exposed situations and solid ground yielding the finest. Mahogany with figured grain is especially prized, and is obtained largely, but not exclusively, from the San Domingo and Cuba wood, called Spanish mahogany. The Honduras mahogany (a baywood, shipped from the Bay of Campeche, is more open-grained and plain, and of larger dimensions, yielding logs sometimes as tall as 100 ft. The Mexican mahogany has the largest growth of all, is similar to the last named, and supplements its diminishing supply.

maledict (mal'-e-dikt'), v. t. [< L. maledictus, pp. of maledicere = It. maledicere, maledire = Pg. maledire = Sp. maledir, speak evil of, < mal, adv., evil (< malus, evil; see mal²), + dicere, speak; see dictum.] To address with maledictions; curse. [Obsolete or archaic.]

She was reproached and maledicted by her father, on her return, although he knew not where she had been.

S. Judd, Margaret, l. 12.

maledict (mal'-e-dikt'), a. [< ME. maledict (q. v.), < OF. maledict, also maledit, maledit, F. maledit = Sp. Pg. maldito = It. maledetto, < L. maledictus, pp. of maledicere; see maledict, v.] Execrated; accursed; damned. [Rare.]

As the wings of starlings bear them on
In the cold season in large band and fall,
So doth that blast the spirits maledict.

Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, v. 61.

malediction (mal'-e-dik'-shon), n. [< ME. malediccion, < OF. malediccion, also (malediccion, malediccion, > E. malediccion) F. malediccion = Pr. malediccion, malediccion = Sp. maldiccion = Pg. maldiccion = It. maledicione, maledicione, < L. maledictio (-io), evil speaking, abuse, L. the act of cursing, < maledicere, speak evil of; see maledict, v. CF. malediccion.] Evil speaking; a cursing; the utterance of a curse or execration; also, a curse.

Now ye shall [hanc] malediction.

Rom. of Parsony (E. E. T. S.), l. 586.

My name perhaps among the circumscribed . . .

With malediction mention'd.

Milton, S. A., l. 399.

Syn. Malediction, Curse, Imprecation, Execration, Anathema. All these are strong words; they are all presumably of the nature of prayers, malediction having the least of this meaning. Malediction in its derivation contains the idea that is common to them all, that of expressing a desire for evil upon another. Curse, imprecation, and execration are often used of the wanton calling down of evil upon those with whom one is angry, but all five may indicate a formal or official act. Execration expresses most of personal hatred, indeed, the word is sometimes used simply to express an intense and outspoken hatred; as, he was held in execration. Anathema has kept within its original limits as expressing a curse pronounced formally by ecclesiastical authority.

maledictory (mal'-e-dik'-to-ri), a. Pertaining to, containing, or consisting in malediction or cursing; imprecatory.

She pointed out . . . a flood of maledictory prophecy against the doors of the dead; . . . she cursed with outstretched arms.

Geo. MacDonald, What's Mine's Mine, p. 218.

maledight, a. [< ME. < OF. maledit, maledict, < L. maledictus, pp.; see maledict.] Cursed.

Cometh a child maledit.

Azeca Jesus to rise he hat.

Curser Mundi. (Hallwell.)

maledisanti, n. [Also maldisanti; < OF. maledisant, F. maldisant, evil-speaking; see maledicent.] One who speaks evil. Minshew.

How then will scolding readers escape this mark of a maldisant?

Florida, II, Dict., To the Reader, p. 191.

malefaction (mal'-e-fak'-shon), n. [< L. malefactum, n., injury (used only in derived sense of fainting, syncope), < malefacere, do evil, harm, < male, evil, + facere, do; see fact.] CF. benefaction.] Heinous wrong-doing; a criminal deed; a crime; a wrong; a bad or curse.

They have proclaimed their malefactions.

Shak., Hamlet, II, 2, 621.

Such disregard of self as brings on suffering . . . is a malefaction to others.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 72.

malefactor (mal'-e-fak'-tor), n. [Formerly also malfactor; = Sp. malhecho = Pg. malfactor = It. malfattore, < L. malefactor, an evil-doer, < maledicere, do evil; see malefaction.] CF. benefactor.] 1. One who does evil or injury to another; opposed to benefactor.

Some benefactors in repute are malefactors in effect.

Follen, Hist. Cambridge, VIII, 28.

Goodman Warmhouse was mounted on a round, smilling nag, and rode much at his ease by the chariot of his malefactor.

Brooks, Fool of Quality, I, 312.

2. A heinous evil-doer; a law-breaker; a criminal or felon.

They came out against him as a Malefactor, with swords and staves, and having seized his person, being betrayed into their hands by one of his disciples, they carry him to the High Priests house.

Stillinger, lect. sermons, I, vi.

Syn. 2. Evil-doer, culprit, felon, convict.

malefactress (mal'-e-fak'-tres), n. [As malefactor + -ess.] A female malefactor; a woman guilty of crime.

malefactance, n. See malfactance.

male-fern (mal'-fer-n), n. An elegant fern, Aspidium Filix-mas (Aspidium Filix-mas of Richard; Lastreia Filix-mas of Presl), with the fronds growing in a crown, found in North and South America, Europe, Asia, and Africa. See out under fern. — Male-fern oil, an antiseptic oil obtained from the rhizomes of Aspidium Filix-mas.

malefic (mal'-e-fik'), a. and n. [= F. malefique = Sp. malefico = Pg. malefico = It. malefico, < L. maleficus (also maleficus), evil-doing, hurtful, mischievous, < malefacere, do evil; see malefaction.] 1. a. Doing mischief; producing disaster or evil; inauspicious. [Chiefly technical.]

The Malefic Aspects are the semi-quadrant of the square, the square, the oblique, and the opposition.

Sadler, Oriss. of Astral, p. 399.

hatred: sometimes used in a lighter sense. See malicious, 1.

Thy father hates my friends and family,
And thou hast been the heir of all his malice.
Pletcher, Phigra, II. 2.

4. In law, a design or intention of doing mischief to another; the evil intention (either actual or implied) with which one deliberately, and without justification or excuse, does a wrongful act which is injurious to others. — Actual malice, express malice, malice in fact, malice in law, in which the intention includes a contemplation of some injury to be done. Constructive malice, implied malice, imputed malice, malice in law, that which, irrespective of actual intent to injure, is attributed by the law to an injurious act intentionally done, without proper motive, as distinguished from actual malice, either proved or presumed. Malice aforethought, or malice prepense, actual malice, particularly in case of homicide. — Syn. 3. Ill will, Enmity, etc. (see animosity), maliciousness, venom, spitefulness, depravity.

malice (mal'is), v. t. [malice, n.] To regard with malice; bear extreme ill will to; also, to envy and hate.

Love and live with your fellows honestly, quietly, caringly, that no man have cause either to hate you for your stubbornness or to love you for your proud ungeniality.
Tobias Book (L. T. S.), p. 300.

I find men faultless to be naturally such that . . . he will seek revenge against them that notice him, or practice his harms.
Pursham, Art of Log. Poole, p. 49.

I am so far from malingering their status,
That I begin to pity them.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, v. 7.

maliced (mal'ist), p. a. Regarded with malice; envied and hated.

Thus every day they seem'd to prate
At malice of a good estate.
Pursham, Child a Ballad, IV. 200.

Your forced atings
Would hide themselves within his maliced sides.
B. Jonson, Postmaster, Ind.

maliceless (mal'is-less), a. [malice + -less.] Free from ill will, hatred, or disposition to harm.
Abb. Loughton, On Peter, l. 22.

malichol, n. See malicho.

malicious (mal'ish-us), a. [ME. malicious, < OF. malicieux, F. malicieux — Sp. Pg. malicioso — It. malizioso, < L. malitiosus, full of malice, wicked, malicious, < malitia, badness, malice; see malice.] 1. Indulging in or feeling malice; harboring ill-will, enmity, or hostility; actively malevolent; malignant in heart; often used in a lighter sense, implying mischievousness with some ill will.

But the Sublime that were malicious hadle sette spies on every side of the town, and so was the Quene taken and the stward slain.
Methu (E. E. T. S.), II. 108.

I count him bloody,
Luxurious, avaricious, false, deceitful,
Sudden, malicious, smacking of every sin
That has a name.
Shak., Macbeth, IV. 3. 30.

Proceeding from extreme hatred or ill-will; dictated by malice; as, a malicious report.

He will die by to the lords, I fear,
And with malicious counsel stir them up
Some way or other yet further to afflict thee.
Milton, S. A., l. 120.

Malicious abandonment, in law, the desertion of a spouse without just cause. Malicious mischief, in law, (a) The committing of physical injury to personal property of another, injury to property from wantonness or malice, as distinguished from theft. (b) Any malicious or mischievous physical injury to the rights of another, or of the public in general. Malicious prosecution, (a) A prosecution at law on foot or carried on maliciously, without reasonable cause. From want of probable cause malice may be inferred. The term is commonly applied to criminal prosecutions, but is also applicable to a civil prosecution. (b) An action brought by the sufferer to recover damages from the person who set on foot such a prosecution. Syn. Evil minded, ill disposed, spiteful, revengeful. See animosity.

maliciously (mal'ish-us-ly), adv. In a malicious or spiteful manner; with malice, enmity, or ill-will; wantonly; with wilful disregard of duty. maliciousness (mal'ish-us-ness), n. The quality of being malicious; extreme enmity or disposition to injure; malignity.

malicorium (mal-i-ko'ri-um), n. [L. malum, an apple, + corium, skin, hide.] The thick and tough rind of the pomegranate fruit. It has been used as an astringent in medicine, and for tanning.

malidentification (mal-i-ten'fi-fi-ka'shon), n. [mal- + identification.] A false identification.

At A. Smith Woodward, after an examination of the type of Bucklandium dituvil, determined that it is truly the imperit of head and pectoral such of a Silenoid. Incredible as such a malidentification on the part of Smith must appear, I presume the determination of Mr. Woodward must be accepted.
Ames, Nat. Hist., 1880.

maliferous (mal-i-f'e-rus), a. [L. malum, an evil, + ferre = to bear.] Bringing evil; unwholesome; pestilential. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

I had really forgotten to mention that gallant, fine-hearted soldier who . . . fell a victim to the maliferous climate of China.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 72.

malign (mā-lin'), a. [OF. maling, F. malin, form. maligne = Pr. maligne = Sp. Pg. It. maligno, < L. malignus, of an evil nature, orig. malignus*, < malus, bad, evil, + -genus, -born; see -genous. Cf. benign.] 1. Having a very evil disposition toward others; harboring violent hatred or enmity; malicious.

Witchcraft may be by operation of malign spirits.
Bacon.

2. Unpropitious; pernicious; tending to injure; likely to do or cause great harm; as, the malign influence of a designing knave. — 3. In astrology, having an evil influence.

Two planets, rushing from aspect malign
Of fiercest opposition.
Milton, P. L., vi. 513.

4. Malignant.

He that turneth the humours back, and maketh the wound bleed inward, endangers the malign etc., and pernicious impatiments.
Bacon, Seditious and Troubles (ed. 1587).

Syn. 1. See list under malicious.

malign (ma-lin'), v. t. [OF. maligner, maliner, pervert, deceive, F. dial. maligner, malign, < maling, F. malin, malign; see malign, a.] 1. trans. To treat with extreme enmity; injure maliciously.

Though wayward fortune did malign my state,
My derivation was from ancestors
Who stood equivalent with mighty kings.
Shak., Pericles, v. 1. (b).

The search of wood and water, with the barrenness of the soils in other places, show how it is maligned of the elements.
Pursham, Phigra, p. 224.

2. To speak evil of; traduce; defame; vilify.

Be not light of credence to new rayed tales, nor crimes, nor simple lies to undergo to him.
Bacon Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 100.

Our Puritan ancestors have been misrepresented and maligned by persons without imagination enough to make themselves contemporary with, and therefore able to understand, the men whose memories they strive to obliterate.
Lowell, Harvard Anniversary.

Syn. 2. Defame, Calumniate, etc. See aspere.

II. intrans. To entertain malice.
This odious fool . . . maligning that anything should be spoke or understood above his own genuine baseness.
Milton, Coleridge.

malignance (ma-lig'nan-s), n. [< malignancy (see malignancy) + -ance.] Same as malignancy.

The minister, as being much nearer both in eye and duty than the knight, it speeds him better to overtake that diffident malignance, with some gentle pout of admonishment.
Milton, Church Government, II. 3.

malignancy (ma-lig'nan-si), n. [< malignancy (see malignancy) + -cy.] 1. The state of being malignant in feeling or purpose; extreme malevolence; bitter enmity; malice; as, malignancy of heart.

In some cases, malignancy seems rather more pertinently applied to a cold depravity of nature, and malignancy to indications of this depravity in temper and conduct in particular instances.
F. Bacon, On the Passions, II. 4. 3.

2. In Eng. hist., the state of being a malignant; adherence to the royal party in the time of Cromwell and the civil war. See malignant, n. 2. — 3. The property of expressing malice or evil intent; malignant or threatening nature or character; unpropitiousness. Specifically (a) In astrology, tendency to irreparable harm or mischief, as, the malignancy of aspect of the planets.

The malignancy of my fate might perhaps distemper yours.
Shak., L. N., II. 1. 4.

(b) In pathol., violence, tendency to a worse condition as, the malignancy of a tumor.

malignant (mā-lig'nant), a. and n. [OF. malignant, < L. malignus (see malign, a.), also deponent, malignari, to do or make maliciously, < malignus, malign; see malign.] 1. a. 1. Disposed to inflict suffering or cause distress; having extreme malevolence or enmity; violently hostile; in depravity; as, a malignant heart.

There was a bitter and malignant party grown up now to such a boldness as to give out incident and threatening speeches against the Parliament in 1641.

He speaks harshly and malignantly of many of his contemporaries and towards Cervantes . . . he is absolutely malignant.
Tobias, Spain, lit. III. 91.

2. Violently harmful or mischievous; threatening great danger; pernicious in influence or effect.

Verdun and malignant plucked many of them, discovering something in their nature by the soil and barren, backward visage of their leaves, flowers, and fruit.
Row, Weeks of Creation, I.

Specifically (a) In astrology, threatening to fortune or life, fatal. (b) In pathology, aspect of the state of malignancy and ill-holding stars.

0 malignant and ill-holding stars!
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 3. 6.

(b) In pathol., virulent; tending to produce death; threatening a fatal issue: as, a malignant ulcer; a malignant fever; malignant pustule or scarlet fever.

3. Extremely heinous: as, the malignant nature of sin. — Malignant anthrax, fever, pustule, etc. See the nouns. — Syn. 1. Malevolent, bitter, venomous, spiteful, malign. See animosity.

II. n. 1. A person of extreme enmity or evil intentions; an ill-affected person.

Objection was taken by certain malignants secretly to undermine his [St. Paul's] great authority in the Church of Christ.
Hooker, Eccl. Polity, III. 2.

2. Specifically, in Eng. hist., one of the adherents of Charles I. and his son Charles II. during the civil war; a Royalist; a Cavalier; so called by the Roundheads, the opposite party.

How will dissenting brethren resist it?
What will malignants say?

K. Butler, Hudibras, I. II. 620.

One may, indeed, sometimes discover among the malignants of the sex a face that seems to have been naturally designed for a Whig lady.

Addison, The Ladies' Association.

malignantly (mā-lig'nant-ly), adv. In a malignant manner; maliciously; with extreme malevolence; with pernicious influence; also, virulently.

maligner (ma-li'n-er), n. One who maligns or speaks malignantly of another; a traducer; a defamer.

I come a spite? no, Roderigo, no;
A hate of thy person, a maligner!
So far from that, I brought no malice with me.
Pletcher, Phigra, II. 2.

malignify (mā-lig'ni-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. malignified, ppr. malignifying. [< L. malignus, malign, + -ficare, < facere, make; see -fy.] To render malign or malignant. [Rare.]

malignity (ma-lig'ni-ti), n. [< F. malignité = Sp. malignidad = Pg. malignidade = It. malignità, < L. malignus (see malign, a.), + -itas, ill-will, spite, malice, < malignus, malign; see malign.] 1. The character or state of being malignant; extreme enmity or evil disposition toward another, proceeding from baseness of heart; malice or malevolence; deep-rooted spite.

Then cometh malignity, through which a man annoeth his neighbor.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Thou hast . . . an unrelenting purpose — a steady long-breathed malignity, that surpasses mine.
Scott, Kenilworth, IV.

2. The quality of being malignant or malignant; extreme evilness; heinousness; specifically, in pathol., virulence; malignancy.

This shows the high malignity of fraud.
South.
Some diseases . . . have in a manner worn out their malignity, so as to be no longer mortal.
Deyden, Blind and Panther, Pref.

Syn. 1. Ill-will, Enmity (see animosity), maliciousness. 2. Detraction, calumny, deadliness.

malignly (mā-lin'ly), adv. In a malignant manner; with extreme ill-will; unpropitiously; perniciously.

malignment (mā-lin'ment), n. [< malign + -ment.] The act of maligning. [Rare.]

That recrimination and malignment of motive.
The Century, XXX. 675.

Malikite (mal'ik-ite), n. [< Ar. Malik (see def.) + -ite.] A follower of Malik, the Imam, the founder of one of the four great sects of Sunni Moslems.

Malines lace. [< F. Malines, Mechlin lace.] Same as Mechlin lace (which see, under lace).

malinfluence (mal-in-flu-ens), n. [< mal- + influence.] Evil influence.

Doubting whether optimism had any connection with the latter stage of my bodily wretchedness — (except, indeed, as having left the body weaker . . . and thus predisposed to any mal-influence whatever).
De Quincey, Confessions, App. p. 130.

maligner (ma-lig'ner), v. t. [< F. malingner, a slang word meaning 'suffer,' but prob. also at one time 'pretend to be ill,' cf. malingrux, weak, sickly, formerly applied to beggars who feigned to be sick or injured in order to excite compassion, < malingre, 'sore, scabby, ugly, loathsome' (Cotgrave), now ailing, poor, weakly, < mal-, badly, + (prok.) OF. malingre, beingre, thin, emaciated, F. dial. malingre, ailing, poorly, prob. < L. ager (ager-), sick, ill. The sense is perhaps affected by association with F. malin, evil, malign, and prok. inclination (cf. malgre, against.)] To feign illness; sham sickness in order to avoid duty; counterfeited disease.

Hemeralopia has been observed to break out epidemically in camps, etc. I need hardly point out that in such cases a careful examination should always be instituted to guard against malingering.
J. S. Fries, Dis. of Eye, p. 412.

malingerer (mā-lig'ner-er), n. One who shams illness, especially for the purpose of shirking work or avoiding duty.

Malleifera (mal-ē-if'ē-rē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of malleifer; see malleiferous.] A superclass of craniate Vertebrata, or skulled vertebrates, distinguished by the development of the malleus as a bone of the ear, and by the direct articulation of the lower jaw to the skull. It corresponds to the class Mammalia, and contrasts with Quadrata and Eggsfera.

malleiferous (mal-ē-if'ē-rūs), a. [L. malleifer, cl. l. malleus, a hammer, a mull, + ferre, = F. bear.] Having a distinct malleus; of or pertaining to the Malleifera; mammalian.

malleiform (mal-ē-i-fōrm), a. [cl. l. malleus, a hammer, a mull, + forma, form.] In form, hammer-shaped.

In some species of Polynae the pappus gives rise at corresponding points, to large, richly dilated, malleiform tubercles. Hazen, Anal. Invert. p. 219.

malleomarking (mal-ē-mā-rō'king), n. [Verbal n. of "malleomark", an unrecorded verb, perhaps equiv. to "malleomake, lit. act like the malleomake, or malleomuck, cl. malleomake, malleomuck, the fulmar petrel; see malleomuck. Cf. D. malleomolen, carousal.] Avut., the visiting and carousing of seamen in the Greenland ships. Sailor's Word-book.

malleomuck (mal-ē-muk), n. [Also malleomuck, malleomake, malleomuck, malleomuck, malleomuck, malleomuck, etc.; cl. G. malleomuck, = D. malleomuck, a malleomuck, explained, from the D., as 'foolish fly' or 'fool fly', as if cl. D. malleom, fool, dully, + mug, MD. mugge, a 'fly', in allusion to its heedless habits; but the D. word is not open to this explanation. D. mug means rather a 'goat' (= E. midg), and cannot refer to the 'flying' of a bird. The name is prob. of northern origin.] The fulmar petrel, Fulmarus glacialis; also extended to some related birds, as albatrosses. See cl. under fulmar. Also called malleomark.

malleolar (mal-ē-o-lēr), a. [cl. malleolus + -ar.] 1. Having the character of a malleolus; as, the malleolar process of the tibia. — 2. Of or pertaining to other malleolus; as, a malleolar artery.

malleolus (mal-ē-o-lūs), n.; pl. malleoli (-lī). [NL., cl. l. malleolus, a small hammer, dim. of malleus, a hammer; see malleus.] 1. In anat., a bony protuberance on either side of the ankle. The two together contribute to the stability of the ankle joint, by locking the astragalus so as to prevent lateral and rotatory movements. In man the outer malleolus is formed by the fibula, the inner by the tibia, and each forms a sort of pulley or trochlea around which wind the tendons of important extensor muscles of the foot. The malleoli are little distinguished in most animals, owing to the different act of the foot upon the leg, or the different configuration of the parts. When, as often occurs, the fibula does not reach the ankle, the outer malleolus is wanting unless formed by the fibula. In birds the condyles of the tibia, constituted by ankylosis of proximal tarsal bones, take the name and place of malleoli. 2. In bot., a layer, a shoot bent into the ground and half divided at the bend, whence it emits roots. Lindley. — 3. [cap.] In conch., a genus of bivalve shells. J. F. Gray, 1817. Inner malleolus, the malleolar process of the tibia, articulating with the inner side of the astragalus, having behind it the tendons of the fibularis posterior and flexor digitorum. Outer malleolus, the enlarged lower end of the fibula, articulating with the outer side of the astragalus, having behind it the tendons of the peroneus longus and peroneus brevis.

malleoramate (mal-ē-o-rā'māt), a. [cl. l. malleus, a hammer, + ramus, a branch, see ramate.] In rotifers, having mallei fastened by unci to ramus, as in the Mellechorda, Frustranda, Pterodactylus, and Pterodactylus.

mallet (mal'et), n. [OF. mallet, mallet, F. mallet (= Pr. mallet = It. malletto), a wooden hammer, mallet, dim. of mal, malle, a hammer; see mull.] 1. A small beetle or wooden hammer used by carpenters, stonemasons, printers, etc., chiefly for driving another tool, as a chisel, or the like. It is wielded with one hand, while the heavier mull requires the use of both hands. — 2. The wooden hammer used to strike the balls in the game of croquet. Automatic mallet, same as dentist hammer (which see under dentist).

Dental mallet. (a) A light hammer of wood or metal used by dentists for striking the plugger in the operation of filling teeth. It is now superseded in great part by various mechanical contrivances, such as the dental hammer or plugger and the electric plugger. (b) A dental hammer or plugger. See hammer.

mallet-flower (mal'et-flō-er), n. Any plant of the genus Epistria.

malleus (mal'ē-us), n.; pl. mallei (-ī). [NL., cl. l. malleus, a hammer, a mull; see mull.] 1. In anat., the proximal element of Meckel's eartilage, in any way distinguished from the rest of the mandibular arch. In man and other mammals the malleus is separately ossified, and is the outer one of the three bonelets or ossicles of the ear lodged in the cavity of the tympanum, connected with the ear-drum or tympanic membrane, and movably articulated with the incus. It is named from its hammer-like shape in man, having a head, neck, and handle or short process together with a processus gracilis, which lies in the Glenoid fossa. As one of the ossicula auditus, the malleus subserves the function of hearing in mammals. In birds, and many other vertebrates below mammals, the malleus has a very different office, that of forming part of the suspensorium of the lower jaw, which is its true morphological character. Its specialization in Mammalia is peculiar to that class. See Malleifera, and cl. under hynd, ear, and tympanic.

2. In whit., one of the Weberian ossicles which form a chain between the air-bladder and the auditory apparatus in the skull of pleurostomylous and nematognathous fishes. It is homologous with the homopophys of the third one of the concolor anterior vertebræ. — 3. In rotifers, one of the paired calcareous structures within the pharynx. In the typical form it is a hammer-like body, consisting of an upper part or head, called the uncus, and a lower part or handle, named the manubrium, but in other forms the distinction disappears.

4. [cap.] In conch., a genus of pearl-oysters of the family Tricardida, founded by Lamarck in 1790; the hammer shells. They have a long winged hinge at right angles with the length of the valve, giving a hammer-like shape, whence the name. Young shells are like those of Arca or wing shells, and have a byssal notch, the hammer shape is gradually acquired with age. M. vulgaris, the hammer-oyster, inhabits Eastern seas. See cl. under hammer shell.

5. Same as war-hammer.

malleanders (mal'ē-n-dēr-z), n. pl. Same as malleanders.

Mallophaga (ma-lōf'a-gw), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of mallophagus; see mallophagous.] A group of ametabolous apterous parasitic insects with mandibulate mouth-parts and concealed mesometathorax, jointed antennae and palpi, superior spiracles, and short stout legs ending in hooked claws. They are known as bird lice, and are very numerous and diversified. By some they are regarded as Hemiptera degraded and distorted by parasitism, and placed with the true lice in a group Parasitica or Aphidura; by others they are held to constitute a superfamily or suborder of Psocodermatophora, and by others again a suborder of Corrodentia. See cl. under.

mallophagan (ma-lōf'a-gw), n. and a. [cl. NL. Mallophaga + -an.] 1. a. Same as mallophagous. II. n. A louse of the genus Mallophaga.

Mallophagidae (mal-lō-fag'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., cl. Mallophaga + -idae.] The mallophagous insects regarded as a family of Psocodermatophora, and corresponding to the suborder Mallophaga. They differ from true lice in having nondilatable instead of a total mouth parts, and in other respects. Most of them live on the plumage of birds, whence the name bird lice for the whole of them, but some also infest the pelage of mammals. Some are great pests of the poultry-yard and aviary. The genera are numerous, including Arctopsylla, Trochilopsylla, and Gonolophus.

mallophagous (ma-lōf'a-gw), a. [cl. NL. mallophagus, cl. Gr. mallos, a lock of wool, + phagō, eat.] In entom.: (a) Devouring feathers or hairs and dried skins, as many coleopterous larvae. (b) Pertaining to the Mallophaga. Also mallophagan.

Mallorquin (ma-lōr'kin), n. [Sp. Mallorquina, = Mallorca, Majorca, see Majorca.] Same as Majorcan.

Mallotus (ma-lō'tus), n. [NL., Cl. Laureiro, 1790], cl. Gr. mallotus, furnished with wool, fleecy, cl. Gr. mallon, clothed with wool, cl. Gr. mallon, wool.] 1. A genus of plants of the natural order Euphorbiaceae, tribe Calceolarieae, and subtribe Calceolarieae, characterized by the oblong parallel anther cells and the numerous (rarely less than fifteen) stamens. The flowers are apetalous, either dioecious or monocious. The plants are trees or shrubs with generally alternate leaves. The male flowers are generally small or short pedicels in heads along a rachis, the pistillate ones a flower on long or short pedicels. There are about 5 species, numerous in Eastern India, the Malay archipelago, and Australia, with a few in Africa. One species, M. philippinensis, yields the dyestuff known as indigo. 2. In whit. (Cuvier, 1829), a genus of fishes of the family Agonidae, formerly placed in Siluridae, of which the male has a broad longitudinal villous or fleshy band of scales differentiated from the rest; the caprine. The type is Mallotus rubrus, the caprine. See cl. under caprine.

mallow (mal'ō), n. [cl. ME. malowe, malus, cl. AS. malwe, malwe = D. malwa = G. malve = OF. malve, F. mauve = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. malva, cl. L. malva, prob. with some alteration (cf. L. malva, mentioned by Pliny as one Gr. form) of the form later used as Gr. malache (also malache), cl. Gr. malazōn, also malazōn (later malāza, malāz, after L.), mallow, appar. so called from its emollient properties, or perhaps from its soft, downy leaves, cl. malacore, soften, cl. malacty, Branch of Mallow, Malva sylvestris, with flowers and fruits. a, a flower; b, the fruit; c, one of the carpels.

Hence maum, maum, etc.] I. n. 1. Earth containing a considerable quantity of chalk in fine particles; a calcareous loam, constituting in the southeastern counties of England a soil especially suited for the growth of hops; a kind of earth suitable for making the best quality of brick without any addition. The brickmakers in the vicinity of London divide the brick-path of that region into strong clay, mull clay (or loam), and malm. Artificial malm is a mixture imitating the natural earth. See maum brick, below.

To the north-west, north, and east of the village of Selborne is a range of far enclosures, consisting of what is called a white maim, a sort of rotten or rubble stone, which, when turned up to the front and rain, moulders to pieces and becomes manure to itself.

Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. Selborne (ed. Bohn), p. 15.

2. [cap.] The name used in Germany, and frequently by geologists writing in English on the geology of that country, for the uppermost of the three divisions of the Jurassic series, all of which at an early day received English provincial names, namely Lias, Dogger, and Malm.

Some make the Egyptians first inventors of Wine . . . and of Beer, to which end they first made Malt of Barley for such places as wanted Grapes.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 362.

The ale shall ne'er be brewin' of malt.
The Enchanted Ring (Child's Ballads, III, 53).

2. Liquor produced from malt, as ale, porter, or beer.

Behoold malt found me well and malt.
Johns, Armstrong (Child's Ballads, VI, 14).

Blown malt, malt dried in a kiln in which the heat is raised quickly to 100° F., and then lowered. It is so called from its distended appearance. Encyc. Brit. Malt-cleaning machine, by a brewery, a form of grain cleaner for freeing barley, previous to malting, from all extraneous substance, such as other grain, weeds of grass and weeds, dust, and foul matters, a cleaning and sorting machine.

II. a. Pertaining to, containing, or made with malt. Malt liquor, a general term for an alcoholic beverage produced merely by the fermentation of malt, as opposed to those obtained by the distillation of malt or grain.

malt¹ (malt'), v. [< malt, n.] I. trans. To convert (grain) into malt. The steps in the process of malting are four: First, steeping in water from twenty-four to forty hours, by which the grain takes up from 10 to 50 per cent. of water, swells, and begins to germinate. Second, couching, in which the steeped grain is piled in heaps on a floor, usually made of flagstones, and where in the growth of the rootlets is aided by heat generated in the mass. Third, flooring, in which the germinating grain is spread upon a floor in charges called floors, and stirred to expose it to air, and in which the growth of the rootlets is checked and the germination of the acrospira is carried to the desired limit. Fourth, drying, in which the germination is completely arrested by heat in a malt kiln. The maltster decides, from the length and appearance of the acrospira when the conversion of the starch has been carried to the right limit. The dried acrospira and the rootlets are broken off by hand in the kiln, and are removed by sifting. The chemical changes effected by the partial germination and subsequent treatment of the grain are chiefly the conversion of the azotized substances into diastase, the conversion of the starch into grape sugar by the action of the diastase, and the imparting of color and flavor to the malt in the kiln. The malt is either pale or dark in color, according to the degree of heat and the length of time it is exposed to heat in the kiln; and a peculiar flavor is derived from empyreumatic oil generated in the husk.

II. intrans. 1. To become malt; to be converted into malt.

To house it green . . . will make it malt worse.
Marston, Husbandry.

2. To drink malt liquor. [Humorous or low.]
She drank nothing lower than Curwen, Manchines, or pluk Noyan,
And on principle never malt-d.

Hood, Miss Kilmansegg, Her Birth.

Well, for my part, I malt. Marston, Jacob Faithful.

malt-extract (malt'eks'trakt), n. A concentrated unfermented infusion of malt. It is used in medicine in cases where it is desirable to further the nutrition.

malt-floor (malt'flor), n. 1. A perforated iron or tin floor in the chamber of a malt-kiln, through which the heat ascends from the furnace below, and dries the grain laid upon it. — 2. A floor on which grain is spread to undergo partial germination in the process of malting. — 3. A charge of grain spread on a floor of a malt-house to undergo partial germination. See malt and malting.

maltha (mal'tha), n. [< L. maltha (see def.), < Gr. maltha, malthā, a mixture of wax and pitch used for caulking ships.] A bituminous substance midway in consistency between asphaltum and petroleum. From its tarry appearance, it is sometimes called mineral tar; it is the breca of the Mexican Spanish. By the Romans the word maltha was used as the name of various cement, stucco, and other preparations of a similar kind employed for repairing cisterns, roofs, etc., and of some of these what is now known as maltha, or some other form of bitumen, in all probability constituted a part. Asphaltum and maltha were also used from the earliest times as stated in Genesis with regard to the building of the Tower of Babel for the same purpose for which our common mortar is employed, namely to bind together stones and bricks.

malthe', n. [ML. < L. maltha; see maltha.] Mortar; cement.

Convenient it is to knowe, of malthe
 . . . what malthe hoots and colds
Are able, ther to chyngeur chiffe or sothe to
To make it boole.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 41.

Malthe' (mal'the'), n. [NL. < Gr. malthē or malthā, a fish so named, supposed by some to have been the angler, Lophius.] A genus of pedicellate fishes, typical of the family Maltheidae; the bat-fishes. M. opercularis inhabits tropical seas. See cuts under bat-fish.

maltheid (mal'the'id), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characteristics of the Maltheidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Maltheidae. Maltheidae (mal'the-'i-dei), n. pl. [NL. < Malthe' + -idae.] A family of pedicellate fishes with branched apertures in the superior axilla of the pectoral fins, the anterior dorsal ray in a cavity overhanging by the anterior margin of the forehead, the mouth subterminal or inferior, and the lower jaw generally received within the upper; the bat-fishes. It includes marine fishes of remarkable aspect, representing two subfamilies, Maltheinae and Haliutinae.

maltheiform (mal'the-i-form), a. Resembling in form a fish of the genus Malthe.

Maltheinae (mal'the-'i-nei), n. pl. [NL. < Malthe' + -inae.] A subfamily of Maltheidae, having the body divided into a cordiform disk and a stout caudal portion, the frontal region elevated, and the snout more or less attenuated. It includes a few American marine forms inhabiting shallow water.

maltheine (mal'the-in), a. and n. [< Malthe' + -ine.] I. a. Pertaining to the Maltheinae, or having their characters.

II. n. A bat fish of the subfamily Maltheinae.

maltheid (mal'the'id), a. and n. I. a. Having the form or characters of the Maltheidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Maltheidae, a malthead.

malt-horse (malt'hors), n. A horse employed in grinding malt by working a treadmill or winch; hence, a slow, heavy horse.

Some, malt-horse, cap'n, conough, idiot, patch.
Shak., l. c. of E. III, l. 32.

He! why, he has no more judgment than a malt-horse.
R. Johnson, Every Man in His Humour, l. 4.

malt-house (malt'hous), n. [< ME. malthouse; < AS. maltheas, & weilt, malt; + hus, house.] A house in which malt is made.

Malthusian (mal'thu-'si-an), a. and n. [< Malthus (see def.) + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Rev. T. R. Malthus (1766-1834), an English economist, or to the doctrines set forth in his "Essay on the Principle of Population." In this work he first made prominent the fact that population, unless limited by positive checks, as wars, famines, etc., or by preventive checks, as moral customs that prevent early marriage, tends to increase at a higher rate than the means of subsistence can, and that the most favorable circumstances be made to increase. As a remedy he advocated the principle that society should aim to diminish the sum of vice and misery, and check the growth of population, by the discouragement of early and imprudent marriages, and by the practice of moral self-restraint.

II. n. A follower of Malthus; a believer in Malthusianism.

Malthusianism (mal-thū-'ei-an-izm), n. [< Malthusian + -ism.] The theory of the relation of population to means of subsistence taught by Malthus. See Malthusian, a.

malting (mal'ting), n. [< malt' + -ing.] A medicinal preparation made by digesting sprouting malt in water, expressing the solution, precipitating with alcohol, and drying the precipitate, which is impure diastase.

malting (mal'ting), n. [Verbal n. of malt', v.] 1. The artificial production of germination in grain for the purpose of converting its starch into the greatest possible amount of sugar, as a preparation for brewing, or the conversion by fermentation of this sugar into alcohol.

Malting consists of four processes, steeping, couching, flooring, and kiln drying.
Encyc. Brit., IV, 367.

2. A place where malting is carried on. [Rare and inaccurate.]

The town also possesses brass foundries, malting kilns, and brick yards.
Ancyc. Brit., XXIV, 591.

malt-kiln (malt'kil), n. A heated chamber in which malt is dried to check germination. Some kilns are fitted with machinery for stirring the malt on the floor of the kiln, this mechanism being called a malt-turner. A smaller apparatus with mechanical devices for stirring the malt is commonly known as a malt-drier.

malt-mad (malt'mad), a. Maddened with drink; addicted to drink; drunken.

These English are so malt-mad, there's no meddling with 'em.
Fletcher, Pilgrims, III, 7.

maltman (malt'man), n.; pl. maltmen (-men). A maltster. Glossaire, Steele (Glas, 70).

malt-master (malt'mas'ter), n. A master maltster.

If the poor cannot reach the price, the maltmaster will.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, II, 216. (Devotee.)

malt-mill (malt'mil), n. A mill for grinding malt.

maltose (mal'tōs), n. [< malt' + -ose.] A sugar (C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁ + H₂O) which forms hard white crystals, is directly fermented by yeast, and is closely like dextrose in its properties. It is produced from starch paste by the action of malt or diastase.

malt-rake (malt'raik), n. An implement for stirring malt on the floor of a malt-kiln. A hoe-shaped part scrapes the grain from the floor, and it falls through fingers set above and behind the hoe.

maltreat (mal-trēt'), v. t. [< malt' + treat.] To treat ill; abuse; treat roughly, rudely, or with unkindness.

York had been never better served in his life; — but it was a little hard to maltreat him after, and plunder him after he was laid in his grave.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, II, 17.

maltreatment (mal-trēt'ment), n. [< maltreat' + -ment.] The act of maltreating, or the condition of being maltreated; ill treatment; ill usage; abuse.

malt-screen (malt'skrēn), n. A machine for freeing malt or barley from foreign matters.

maltster (malt'stēr), n. [< ME. maltster; < malt' + -ster.] A maker of or dealer in malt. Barely also maltster.

malt-surrogate (malt'sur'fō-gāt), n. Any substitute, as corn, potatoes, rice, or potato-starch, used in the manufacture of beer in place of a part of the malt required for the normal manufacture.

malt-tea (malt'tē), n. The liquid infusion of the mash in brewing; water impregnated with the valuable part of the malt, leaving behind the husks or grains. See grain, 6, and wort.

malt-turner (malt'tēr'ner), n. A mechanical device for turning malt as it is heated in the kiln. See malt-kiln, and compare malt-rake.

maltworm (malt'werm), n. A person addicted to the use of malt liquor.

Then doth she frowle to her the bowl,
Even as a maltworm should.
By. Will, Gamster's Garden's Seedle, II, (song).

I am joined with . . . none of these mad, mustachio, purple hued malt worms.
Shak., I Hen. IV., p. 1, 32.

malty (mal'ti), a. [< malt' + -y.] Pertaining to, composed of, or produced from malt.

Backward and forward rush mysterious men with no names, who fly about all these particular parts of the country on which I dwell . . . throwing himself in an antiferous and malty shower.
Deane, Jack House, 11.

malulella (mal-ū-lē'lā), n.; pl. malulellae (-ē). [NL. (Packard, 1863), double dim. of L. mala, jaw; see malin.] An appendix of the front edge of the inner stipes of the deutonymph of a mite. See deutonymph.

They may be 2, 4, 6, or 12 or more, usually an even

For he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him. 1 Sam. xxv. 17.

If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. Mark iv. 23.

O best of men, invisible, invisible,
As a host, on a man's face.

Shak., T. G. of V., II. 1. 112.

A man would expect to find more antipathy.
Addison, Remarks on Italy.

4. Generically, the human race; mankind; for man beings collectively; used without article or plural; as, man is born to trouble; the rights of man.

But he decayed with years; after he was wedded, and left a man, the first creature of man that was formed.
Milton (C. L. T. S.), l. 100.

Man being not only the noblest creature in the world, but even a very world in himself.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, l. 1.

All these his wondrous works, but chiefly man,
His chief delight and favour. Milton, P. L. in 100.

Specifically — 5. A male adult of the human race, as distinguished from a woman or a boy; one who has attained manhood, or who is regarded as of manly estate.

Therewith departed the young Ventres and his company, that was a man of body and a good knight and young of prime baron.
Milton (C. L. T. S.), l. 117.

Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man. 1 Cor. xi. 9.

All the man present signed a paper, declaring that a picture should be painted and a tablet taken from it of her Royal Highness.
Gardner, Memoirs, Sept. 1, 1815.

At Cambridge and at Oxford, every stippling bear counted a man from the moment of his putting on the gown and cap.
Gardner and Canab., p. 7, quoted in College Words.

6. In an emphatic sense, an adult male possessing manly qualities in an eminent degree; one who has the gifts or virtues of true manhood.

Grace & good manners maketh a man.
Book of Proverbs (C. L. T. S.), extra ed. x. 1 to 10.

I dare do all that may become a man,
Who dares do more is none.
Shak., Macbeth, I. 7. 46.

A combination and a form, indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man.
Shak., Hamlet, III. 4. 62.

Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow.
The rest is all but leather or parchment.
Pope, Essay on Man, IV. 260.

7. The qualities which characterize true manhood; manliness.

Met thought he bare himself in such a fashion,
So full of man, and sweetness in his carriage.
R. Johnson, Every Man in his Humour, II. 1.

8. An adult male considered as in some sense pertaining to or under the control of another person; a vassal, follower, servant, attendant, or employee; one immediately subject to the will of another; as, the officers and men of an army; a gentleman's man (a valet or body-servant); I am no man's man.

Like master, like man. Old proverb.

I'll come and call you home to dinner, and my man shall attend you.
Colton, in Walton's Angler, II. 364.

Yet any one who talks to German officers on the subject of their men is more from them that they do not by any means consider the average German as the best material of which to make a soldier.
Pittsburgh Bee, N. Y., XIII. 23.

9. A husband; as, my man is not at home (said by a wife). [Now only provincial or vulgar, except in the phrase man and wife.]

Man and wife as M. and W. have consorted together in holy wedlock, . . . I pronounce that they are Man and Wife.
Book of Common Prayer, Solemnization of Matrimony.

In the next place every wife ought to answer, for her man.
Addison, The Ladies' Assistant.

10. One subject to a mistress; a lover or suitor. [Now vulgar.]

I would not be untrawled for no wight,
But as hire man I would live and serve,
And never more other creature serve.
Chaucer, Troilus, IV. 447.

11. A word of familiar address, often implying some degree of disparagement or impatience.

We speak no treason, man. Shak., Rich. III. I. 1. 36.

manatee (man-a-tee), n. [Also manati, manitau (and lamantia); = F. manate, manat (Colgrave) (and lamantin). NL. manatus. < Sp. manati, of Haytina (W. Ind.). manati, said to mean 'big beaver.'] A sea-cow; a gregarious herbivorous aquatic sirenian mammal, of the genus Manatus, family Manatidae, and order Sirenia. The American manatee, to which the name was originally given, and to which it specially pertains, is Manatus americanus, Manatus, or laminatus, whether of one or two species.

The manatee inhabits the shallow waters of rivers and estuaries on the eastern coast of tropical and subtropical America, from Florida and some of the West India islands to about lat. 20° S. It is a sluggish, timid, and inoffensive animal, found in small herds, feeding on aquatic vegetation, and attaining sometimes a length of 8 or 10 feet. In general aspect the manatee resembles a small whale or other cetacean, but it belongs to a different order, though it was formerly considered a herbivorous cetacean. The body is naked and stout, shaped like that of a fish, without trace of hind limbs, ending in an expansive shovel or spoon-shaped tail, the fore limbs are flippers or paddles without outward distinction of digits, but with flattened nails. The eyes and ears are small, and the whole physiognomy is peculiar, owing to the tumidity and great mobility of the muzzle. There is an entirely distinct species, Manatus senegalensis, found on the western coast of Africa, to which the name extends.

Manatidae (ma-nat'i-de), n. pl. [NL. < Manatus + -idae.] A family of sirenians, formerly united with the genus Manatus. Formerly coextensive with the order Sirenia, it is now restricted, by the exclusion of Halosere, Rhytina, Halitherium, and other genera to forms having the tail entire and rounded, the last five or more vertebrae cylindrical and devoid of transverse processes, and the premaxillary bones short and straight, the sea cows. Sometimes called Trichechidae, a name more frequently applied to walruses. See manatee, Manatus, and Sirenia. Also Manatida, Manatini.

manatin (man'a-tin), n. Same as manatee.

manatine (man'a-tin), n. [< Manatus + -ine.] Resembling or related to a manatee; of or pertaining to the Manatidae, manatoid.

mandate (man-dā't), n. [F.: see mandat.] 1. In French law, a grant of power or authority; a power of attorney.
Mandate or grants in expectancy. Reclam. Middle Ages, II. 302.

2. In French hist., one of the circulating notes which were issued by the government about 1796 on the security of the national domains, called mandats territoriaux, to take the place of the abrogated assignats, and which soon became as worthless as the latter.

mandatary (man-dā't-ā-rē), n.; pl. mandataries (-rēz). [F. mandataire = Sp. Pg. It. mandatario, < L. mandatarius, one to whom a charge or commission is given, < L. mandatum, a charge, command: see mandat.] One to whom a command or charge is given; one who has received and holds a mandate to act for another; an attorney. Specifically: (a) A person to whom the Pope has by his prerogative given a mandate or order for his benefices. (b) In law, one who is authorized and undertaken, without a recompense, to do some act for another in respect to the thing bailed to him. See mandat, 1. Also mandatary.

mandate (man'dāt), n. [= F. mandat = Sp. Pg. It. mandato, < L. mandatum, a charge, order, command, commission, injunction, neut. of mandatus, pp. of mandare, commit to one's charge, order, command, commission, lit. put into one's hands, < manus, hand, + dare, put: see dāt.] (Cf. command, commend, demand, v-mand.) See mandat, an older form of mandat.] 1. A command; an order, precept, or injunction; a commission.

I am commanded hence. (let you away;
I'll send for you anon. Al, I obey the mandate,
And will return to Venice. Shak. Othello, IV. 1. 270.

This dream all-powerful Juno sends; I bear
Her mighty mandate, and her words you hear. Dryden. Amiel, VII. 330.

Mandates for depositing sovereigns were sealed with the signet of "the fisherman." Merck. Rev. in France.

This flower border encloses an autograph Latin mandat, written and signed "propria manu" by "J. Herfordian" himself; which mandat testifies that the volume of the book is prepared and written by his "directus famulus" within Butterfield, and directs that it shall have the custody of it during his natural life.

N. and Q. 7th ser., VIII. 2.

Hence—2. An official command addressed by a superior to an inferior, to control his conduct in a specific manner. Specifically: (a) In Rom. law, an order or decree directed by the emperor to governors of provinces. (b) In canon law, a papal rescript commanding a bishop or other ecclesiastical patron to put the person therein named in possession of the first vacant benefice under his patronage. (c) In early Eng. law, a royal command addressed to a judge or court to control the disposition of a suit. (d) In mod. law procedure, a judicial command, order, precept, or writ; more specifically, the document promulgated upon the decision of an appeal or writ of error, as by the Supreme Court of the United States, directing what shall be done in the court below; also, in some of the States, the writ elsewhere known, as at common law, by the name of mandamus (which see). In this sense mandate usually, but not always necessarily, implies that the direction is given in writing.

3. In early Rom. law (before the doctrines of agency were developed), a trust or commission by which one person, called the mandator, requested another, the mandatarius, to act in his own name and as if for himself in a particular transaction (special mandate), or in all the affairs of the former (general mandate). The mandatarius was the only one recognized as having legal rights and responsibilities as toward third persons in the transactions involved. As between him and the mandator, however, the latter was entitled to all benefit, and bound to indemnify against losses, etc., but the service was gratuitous.

4. In civil law: (a) A contract of bailment in which a thing is transferred by the mandator to the possession of the mandatary, upon an undertaking of the latter to perform gratuitously some service in reference to it; distinguished from a mere deposit for safe keeping. (b) A contract of agency by which the mandator confides a matter of business, or his business generally, to an agent called the mandatary. If the authority or appointment be in writing, the mandate is also called procurator. Mandatary qualifications exist where a person induces another to repose credit in a third person; it answers somewhat to our modern letter of credit.

mandate-bread (man'dāt-brēd), n. The bread distributed to the poor on Maundy Thursday. Also called maundy-loaves.

Mandevilla (man'de-vil-lā), n. [NL. (Laudley, 1840), named after H. J. Mandeville, British minister at Buenos Ayres.] A genus of American apocynaceous plants of the tribe Echinateae and the subtribe Echinateae. The flowers grow in simple racemes, and have a funnel-shaped corolla, a calyx with five scales or an imbricate number of glands, and a disk which is five parted or five-lobed scales. They are tall climbing shrubs, with opposite feathery leaves, and simple racemes of yellow, white, or rarely violet flowers, which are usually large and showy. About 20 species have been described, from Mexico, the West Indies, and tropical America. M. mandevilla, known as the Chili juncus, is remarkable for its very fragrant snowy white flowers, and is common in cultivation.

mandeville, n. [Appar. an erroneous form of mandil, conformed to the surname Mandeville.] Same as mandilion.

mandible (man'di-bl), n. [= F. mandibule = Sp. mandibula = It. mandibola, mandibola, < NL. mandibula, mandible, < L.L. mandibula, < L. mandibulum, n., a jaw, < L. mandere, chew, manducare.] In ool. and ool., a jaw-bone; a jaw, or the jaw-bone and associate parts; especially, the under jaw. (a) In man and other mammals, the under jaw, or inferior maxilla, as distinguished from the upper jaw, maxilla, or superior maxilla. (b) In birds, either part, upper or under, of the beak; that part of either jaw which is covered with horny integument, the two being distinguished as upper and lower. When the term mandible is applied to the lower only, the upper is called maxilla. See cut under bill. (c) In the arthropods, especially insects, either half, right or left, of the first, upper, or outer pair of jaws, considered by some to correspond to the lower jaw of vertebrates, morphologically, one of the first pair of gnathites, always devoid of a pulp, opposed to maxilla, which is either half of the second pair of jaws. See cut under mouth-part. (d) In cephalopods, the horny beak, or rostrum. See mandibular. Dentate mandible, see dentate. Multidentate mandible, in entom., a mandible having many teeth or processes on the inner side.

2. [cap.] A genus of plants of the natural order Solanaceae, the nightshade family, and tribe Atropaceae. The corolla is imbricate in the bud, the calyx is tubular and five-parted, and the pedicels are partially clustered among the radical leaves. They are herbaceous, stemless, rising from a thick, woody, often furrowed root, and bear tufts of large, ovate, lance-shaped leaves, which are reticulate-veined. Five species have been described (but these may be reducible to one), found throughout the Mediterranean region. The ordinary plant has been commonly known as M. officinalis, but this includes a spring and a fall kind sometimes operated on species, M. vernalis and M. autumnalis. The mandragora or mandrake has long been known in medicine, and has been the subject of much superstition. See mandrake.

It is generally believed that the most important factor in the development of the human brain is the environment. The brain is a highly plastic organ, and its development is influenced by a variety of factors, including genetics, nutrition, and social interaction. The environment plays a crucial role in shaping the brain's structure and function, and it is essential for the brain to be stimulated and challenged in order to reach its full potential.

man engine noun en'jin n A form of electric power lifting machine in which the lifting force is transmitted to the load by means of a cable. The cable is attached to the load and is supported by a pulley system. The cable is then attached to the load and is supported by a pulley system. The cable is then attached to the load and is supported by a pulley system.

interruption, the fixed platforms on one side of the shaft being reserved for men ascending, and those on the other side for men descending, each man stepping on his proper platform on the reciprocating rod as it is vacated, at the instant of rest between the strokes, by the man who is traveling in the opposite direction. This is the form of man-engine used in Cornwall. That employed in the Harz mines (where the method originated) is the "dog-bled engine," with two rods moving up and down alternately in opposite directions. This contrivance corresponds to a ladder with movable steps, the miner having nothing to do but to move slightly sideways in order to place himself on the step which is about to go up or down, according as he wishes to ascend or descend. In the United States (e.g., in some mines near Erie, Pa.) are used instead of man-engines. See man car.

manequin (man'e-kin), n. Same as manil in 4. maner¹, n. An obsolete form of *maner*¹. maner², n. Same as maner.

maneria (ma-né-ri-á), n. [ML.: see manner 1.] In Gregorian music, a mixed mode—that is, one that includes the compass both of an authentic and of its plagal mode. Polyphonic music for unequal voices is necessarily thus written. See *mode*¹, 7.

manerial (ma-ne-ri-ál), n. An obsolete variant of manerial.

manerly, adv. An obsolete form of mannerly. manes (ma-néz), n. pl. [L., prob. < O.L. manis, manus, good.] 1. In Rom. antiqu., the spirits of the dead considered as tutelary divinities of their families; the deified shades of the dead, according to the belief that the soul continued to exist and to have relations with earth after the body had perished. Three times a year a pit called the mundus was officially opened in the comitum of the Roman Forum, to permit the manes to come forth. The manes were also honored at certain festivals, as the Parentalia and Feralia, oblations were made to them, and the flame maintained on the altar of the household was a homage to them. [In this sense often written with a capital.]

The most special representatives of ancestor-worship in Europe were perhaps the ancient Romans, whose word manes has become the recognized name for ancestral deities in modern civilized language. They embodied them as images, set them up as household patrons, gratified them with offerings and solemn homage, and, counting them as among the infernal gods, inscribed on tombs D. M., "Dis Manibus."

K. H. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II, 100.

Hence—2. The spirit of a deceased person, or the shades of the dead, whether considered as the object of a cult or not.

Some sages have thought it pious to preserve a certain reverence for the manes of their deceased friends. Steele, Tatler, No. 181.

3. By metonymy—(a) The lower world or infernal regions, as the abode of the manes. (b) The punishments imposed in the lower world.

manful (man'ful), a. [CME. manful, < man + -ful.] Having or expressing the spirit of a man; manifesting the higher qualities of manhood; courageous; noble; high minded.

No grete emptines for to take oh hounde, Shedding of blood, no manful becomese Lyfgate, Complaint of the Black Knight

Nor know I whether I be very base Or very manful, whether very wise Or very foolish. P. Bunsen, Glorious Syn. Manly, etc. (see manly). stout, strong, dignified, undaunted, intrepid.

manfully (man'ful-ly), adv. In a manful manner; boldly; courageously.

manfulness (man'ful-nes), n. The quality of being manful; boldness; nobleness.

man-fungus (man'fung'gus), n. A plant of the genus Boletus.

mang¹ (mang), n. A dialectal variant of *mang*¹. mang² (mang), prep. A dialectal (Scotch) form of *mang*¹, among.

Syne bad him slip frae mang the folk, Some time when we are soed him And try t that night. Burns, Hallowe'en.

manga (mang'ga), n. [ML.] Ecceles, a case or cover; especially, the case for a processional or other cross when not in use, often of rich stuff or embroidered.

mangabey (mang'ga-bé), n. [A geographical name in Madagascar, by Buffon applied erroneously to a kind of monkey not found there.] A monkey of the genus Ceropithecus, of which there are several species, inhabiting Africa. They are of moderate size and slender form, have long limbs and tail and are extremely agile. The face is more prominent than in the species of Ceropithecus from which Ceropithecus is detached, the eyebrows are prominent, and the eyelids are white. The general color is dark or blackish. The sooty mangabey is C. fuscipennis; the white-eyed mangabey is C. albiceps, in which the crown is also white. C. collaris has a white collar. In C. albiceps the crown is crested. Also written mangaby.

mangal, mankal (mang'gal, -kal), n. [Turk. mankal, mankal.] A brazier for a charcoal fire used in Turkey and throughout the Levant, usually of sheet-copper or sheet-brass worked into shape by the hammer, and frequently ornamented with designs in repoussé work.

manganapatite (mang'ga-nap'at-ite), n. [(< mangan + apatite.)] A variety of apatite, unusual in containing manganese. A dark bluish-green kind from Branchville in Connecticut afforded 104 per cent. of manganese protoxide.

manganate (mang'ga-nat), n. [(< mangan + -ate.)] A compound of manganic acid with a base. Also manganate.

manganocolumbite (mang'ga-nó-kó-lum-bit), n. [(< mangan + columbite.)] A variety of columbite in which the iron is largely replaced by manganese.

manganeisen (mang'gan-i-zén), n. [Irreg. < mangan + isen = E. iron.] Ferromanganese; a combination of the metals iron and manganese containing a large percentage (from 50 to 85 per cent.) of the latter. It is manufactured for use in the Bessemer process and is an important adjunct to that operation. The object of the addition of the manganese at the termination of the "blow" is the removal of the oxygen from the iron, without at the same time adding carbon and silicon. This vitally important improvement of the Bessemer process is due to the Scotch metallurgist R. F. Mushet. See steel and spiegel.

manganese (mang'ga-né-sé), n. [(< mangan + -ese.)] Same as manganese.

manganese (mang'ga-né-sé), n. [= F. manganèse (< Sp. Fig. manganese = It. manganese), < NL. manganium, an arbitrarily altered form of magnesium, a name first given to this metal, but now used for a different metal; see magnesium.] Chemical symbol, Mn; atomic weight, 55.02. A metal having a remarkable affinity for, and in some respects a close resemblance to, iron, of which it is an extremely frequent associate. It differs from iron, however, in that it is not used at all by itself in the arts, although of great interest and importance as connected with the manufacture of iron, and as modifying by its presence in small quantity the character of the product obtained. The use of the black sand of manganese for removing the coloring matters from glass was known to the ancients, and mentioned by Pliny, but the nature of the material thus used was not understood until quite modern times. This ignorance was shown in the confusion of the oxide of manganese with the magnetic oxide of iron, the isolation (both manganese and magnesian) being the former was called manganese by chemists in the middle ages, apparently in conformity with Pliny's idea of a dual (magnetic and ferromagnetic) nature in some metals, manganese not having the attractive power of the magnet, and being on that account considered ferromagnetic. Other variants (in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries) of the name of the ore used by glass-makers were maner, maner, maner, and maner. After what we now call manganese had received the name of manganese (after which the idea that this substance was in some way related to the oxide of manganese, the latter began to be called manganese). From the middle of the eighteenth century the combinations of iron and manganese were studied by various chemists, and finally, in 1774, the metal manganese was isolated by Davy, but for years there was much confusion in regard to its specific name, and it was not until after the beginning of the present century that the name manganese (from the German mangan) was generally adopted. The Latin termination in -ium (manganium) is rarely used in modern technical works. This metal has never been found native. As eliminated from its ores by chemical processes it is grayish white in color, resembling cast iron, but varying considerably in hardness and luster according to the nature of the methods by which it was obtained. It is very hard and brittle and has a specific gravity of about 8. It oxidizes rapidly on exposure to the air. Manganese resembles iron in that its ores are widely diffused and differs from that metal remarkably in the fact that, on the whole, its ores are only rarely found in considerable quantity in any one locality, while those of iron exist in abundance in many regions. The important ores of manganese are all oxides, and of these the peroxide (peroxide) called in commerce the black sand or black sand or simply manganese is the most valuable and important. Other manganeseiferous minerals (all oxides) are braunite, hausmannite, psilomelane and various earthy mixtures called black sand, black sand, black sand, black sand, etc. Practically the ore called manganese in commerce is a mixture of various oxides, different samples differing greatly in value, which value has to be determined by chemical analysis. The ores and salts of manganese are of very considerable importance in chemical manufactures, both as bleaching and oxidizing reagents. The nature and importance of this metal in the manufacture of iron and steel will be found indicated under steel and spiegel.—Earthy manganese. See earthy.—Gray manganese ore. Same as manganese.—Manganese brown, an alloy said to be composed of ordinary brown with the addition of manganese. It has the color of gun-metal and its fracture resembles that of fine-grained steel. It is said to equal or exceed in tenacity bar-iron of medium quality. It has been manufactured in England, but has not come into general use. Manganese brown, green, violet, etc. See brown, etc. Manganese copper. Same as manganese copper. Manganese, picro, picrochalcite. See pyrochalcite and picrochalcite. Manganese garnet, spinel, spinelite. See garnet. Manganese spar, rhodochrosite. Red manganese, a mineral usually of a rose-red color; rhodochrosite. Red oxide of manganese, Mn_2O_3 , a compound of manganese and oxygen which may be formed by exposing the peroxide or sesquioxide to a white heat. It occurs native as hausmannite. White manganese, an ore of manganese, manganese carbonate.

manganese-glaze (mang'ga-né-sé-gláz), n. A dark-gray or jet-black glaze, the color of which is given by manganese.

manganesian (mang'ga-né-si-an), a. [(< mangan + -es.)] Pertaining to manganese; consisting of manganese; containing manganese, or characterized by its presence.

manganic (mang'ga-né-sik), a. [(< mangan + -ic.)] Same as manganic.

manganeseum (mang'ga-né-si-um), n. [NL.: see manganese.] Same as manganese. [Rare.]

manganetic (mang'ga-né-tik), a. [(< mangan + -etic, as in magnetic.)] Same as manganiferous.

manganhedenbergite (mang'gan-hed'en-bér-ig-ite), n. [(< mangan + hedenbergite.)] A variety of hedenbergite containing a relatively large amount of manganese, found in Sweden.

manganic (mang'gan-ik), a. [(< mangan + -ic.)] Containing manganese; in chemistry, specifically applied to compounds in which each manganese atom is regarded as quadrivalent.

Also manganic.—Manganic acid, H_2MnO_4 , an acid which is not known in the free state. Manganates of the alkalis are formed when manganese dioxide is heated with an alkali carbonate or nitrate. They have a green color, and readily decompose, forming permanganate and manganese dioxide. The crude alkali manganate was formerly called chameleon mineral from the property which its solution has of passing rapidly through several shades of color, occasioned by changes in its state of oxidation. Manganic oxide, Mn_2O_3 , or manganese sesquioxide, is the mineral braunite.

manganiferous (mang'ga-nif'e-rus), a. [(< NL. manganium + L. ferre = E. bear 1.)] Containing or carrying manganese; as, a manganiferous garnet. Also manganetic.

These higher manganiferous iron ores show little or no magnetic action. C. R. Alder Wright, Encyc. Brit., XIII, 366.

manganite (mang'ga-nit), n. [(< mangan + -ite.)] A hydrated oxide of manganese occurring in orthorhombic crystals of a steel-gray or iron-black color and brilliant luster, also in masses having a columnar structure. It is often altered, by loss of water, to pyrolusite. Also called gray manganese ore.

manganium (mang'ga-ni-um), n. [NL., short for manganium.] Same as manganese.

manganocalcite (mang'ga-nó-kal'sit), n. [(< mangan + calcite.)] A variety of calcite containing manganese carbonate.

manganomagnetite (mang'ga-nó-mag'ne-tit), n. [(< mangan + magnetite.)] A variety of magnetite containing considerable manganese.

manganophyllite (mang'ga-nó-sil'it), n. [(< mangan + phyllite), < Gr. phyllon, leaf, + phyllo.] A manganiferous mica occurring in thin reddish scales at several localities in Sweden.

manganosiderite (mang'ga-nó-sid'e-rit), n. [(< mangan + siderite.)] A carbonate of manganese and iron, intermediate between rhodochrosite and siderite.

manganosite (mang'ga-nó-sit), n. [(< mangan + -ite.)] Manganese protoxide, a mineral occurring in regular octahedrons of an emerald-green color, found at several localities in Sweden.

manganostibite (mang'ga-nó-stib'it), n. [(< mangan + stibite.)] An antimoniate of manganese, occurring in black embedded grains at Nordmark in Sweden.

manganotantalite (mang'ga-nó-tan'tal-ite), n. [(< mangan + tantalite.)] A variety of tantalite in which the iron is largely replaced by manganese. The manganotantalite first known was from the Ural, and had the crystalline form of ordinary columbite. A massive manganotantalite from Sweden is distinguished as manganotantalite.

manganous (mang'ga-nus), a. [(< mangan + -ous.)] Containing manganese; in chemistry, specifically applied to compounds in which each manganese atom is regarded as having a mangonism (mang'gō-niz-m), n. [Fr. mangonisme; It. mangonismo.] The art of mangonizing, or of setting off worthless or poor things to advantage.

Let gentlemen and ladies who are curious trust little by mangonisme, instructions, or medicine, to alter the species, or indeed the form and shape of flowers considerably. Kepler, Calendarium Hortense, March.

mangonist (mang'gō-nist), n. [Fr. mangoniste; It. mangonista.] 1. One who mangonizes, or furbishes up worthless articles for sale.

The mangonist doth feed and graith his horse Money Masters all Things (1698), p. 77. (Keene, Dict.)

2. A strumpet. One who sells humane flesh — a mangonist! Mardon, Dutch Courtisan, l. 1.

mangonize (mang'gō-niz), v. t. [Fr. mangoniser.] To furbish up for sale; Fr. mangoniser, a dealer in slaves or wares who furbishes them up for sale, a furbisher, polisher; Gr. μαγανίζω, a means of charming or bewitching (or deceiving); see mangle.] 1. To polish or furbish up in order to set off to advantage.

Had. What will you ask for them a week, captain? Two. So, you mangonizing slave, I will not part from them. Li Jansen, Pontatour, iii, 1.

2. To fatten, as slaves, for sale.

mangoose, n. See mangos.

mangostan (mang'gō-stan), n. See mangosteen.

mangosteen (mang'gō-sten), n. [Also mangostin; Fr. mangoustin (the tree), mangouste (the fruit); Malay mangusta, mangis.] The important tropical fruit-tree (Garcinia Mangostana); also, its product. Occasionally written mangostine. Wild mangosteen, Tringus, Embury, p. 3.

mango-tree (mang'gō-trē), n. Mangifera indica. See Mangifera and mango.

mangrove (mang'grōv), n. [Formerly also mangrove (1670); appar. an altered form, simulating E. grove, of mango, or some similar form (cf. F. manglier, Sp. mangle, NL. mangle, mangrove) of Malay manggi-manggi, mangrove.] 1. A tree of the genus Rhizophora, chiefly R. mucronata (R. Mangle), the common mangrove, abounding on tropical shores in both hemispheres. It is a low tree of most singular habit, remarkable for a copious development of adventitious roots, which arch out from the lower part of the trunk, and at length descend into the mud, sending down its middle into the mud, sometimes a distance of several feet, before detaching from the parent. By these means the mangrove spreads thickly over the tidal mud, forming impenetrable and highly insular bogs, hundreds of miles in length. The wood is valuable for fuel, for piles, etc., and is susceptible of a beautiful polish. The astringent bark is useful in medicine and for tanning. The fruit is of a dry and coriaceous texture. See cut in preceding column.

2. Another plant of similar habit, especially a plant of the genus Avicennia. They are littoral trees, widely diffused in the tropics, throwing out a tangled mass of arching roots above ground, and sending up abundant aërogenous like shoots from the underground roots. The wood also grows in it. Avicennia (including A. bonariensis), called white mangrove, extends to Australia and New Zealand; the mangrove of the Malay, mistakenly reported to yield an aromatic gum A. indica of tropical America and Africa is the black or olive mangrove. See blackwood, 3.

3. In ool., the mangrove-fish. Red mangrove, a Gulana form or name of the common mangrove. White mangrove, see def. 2, also the white buttonwood (which see). Zaragoza mangrove, Coccoloba creta (which see). See buttonwood, 1.

mangrove-bark (mang'grōv-bark), n. The bark of the common mangrove, of Avicennia officinalis, and of several similar East Indian trees, valuable for tanning. Also mangle-bark.

mangrove-cuckoo (mang'grōv-kū'koo), n. An American tree-cuckoo, Coccyzus senilis or C. minor, found in Florida and some of the West Indian islands; so called from frequenting mangrove. It resembles the common C. americanus and is of about the same size, but the under parts are pale orange-brown instead of white, and the bill is more dusky. See Coccyzus.

mangrove-hen (mang'grōv-hen), n. The common salt-water marsh-hen or clapper-rail, Actitis limicola or R. erythraea. [West Indies.]

mangrove-snapper (mang'grōv-snap'p), n. The bastard snapper, Lutjanus (Rhomboplites) auratus, a sparoid fish of the West Indies and northward to South Carolina. It is about a foot long, and of a vermilion or rose hue in different parts, with irregular yellow spots on the sides. This fish technically differs from other snappers of the same genus in having a diamond-shaped patch of vomerine teeth and fimbriae. See snapper.

mangue (mang'), n. [Fr. mangue.] A viverrine quadruped of Africa, Cassarcus cafer, about Mangue (Cassarcus cafer), a viverrine.

19 inches long, of a nearly uniform dark-brown color, paler on the head, the feet blackish, and the snout long and slender.

Mangusta (mang'gus-tā), n. [NL. (Cuvier), after F. mangouste; see mangoose.] A generic name of ichneumon or mangoose; same as It. pestes.

mangy (mang'y), n. See mangy, 2.

The dog whose mangy cats away his hair. Shapton, Juvenal, viii, 43. (Keene, Dict.) mangy (mang'y), v. t. [Fr. mangier, It. mangiare.] Infected with the mange; scabby; hence, untidily rough or shaggy, as if from mange.

Way, thou tree of a mangy dog! Shak., T. of A., iv, 3, 371.

manhadan, n. See manhadan.

manhandle (man han-dl), v. t. [Fr. mancher, It. manciare.] To move by force of men, without levers or tackles; hence, to handle roughly; pull and push about, as a person, in anger or in sport.

In two minutes (they) were so manhandled and manhandled that it was reported aft. The Century, XXXI, 306.

man-hater (man'hā'tēr), n. 1. One who hates mankind; a misanthrope.

What will they do then, in the name of God and Saints, what will these man-haters yet with more despatch and mischief do? Milton, Church-Government, 2, 100.

2. One who hates the male sex.

Rousseau, of Geneva, a professed man-hater, or, more properly speaking, a philosopher armed with more than half of mankind. Goldsmith, Poetic Learning, viii.

manhead (man'hed), n. [Early mod. E. manhed; ME. manhode = MLA. manheit = OHG. manheit, MLG. manheit, G. manheit; man + head.] 1. The state of being human; human nature; humanity.

The high Physician, our blessed Saviour Christ, whose holy Manhood did ordained for our necessity. Str. T. More, Comfort against Tribulation.

2. Manhood; virility.

Thou mayst syn thou hast wysdom and manhode, Assemblen all the folk of our kynode. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 67.

Some, y schal ther schew — now take hede — And of such maners there declare, It whiche thou schalt come to manhode, To wordly worship, and to weelfare. Dobson, Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 24.

manheim (man'hīm), n. A brass alloy resembling gold. See Manheim gold, under gold.

manhole (man'hōl), n. 1. A hole through which a man may enter a sewer, drain, cess-pool, or the like, for cleaning or repairing; in steam-boilers, hot-water tanks, keels, etc., a hole formed in the shell, through which a man may enter to the interior for cleaning, inspection, or repairs. In the latter cases the hole is provided with a cover by which it may be stopped steam-tight or water-tight, the cover being usually fitted to the inside and the hole made elliptical so that the cover can be easily inserted, the pressure of the steam or water assists in holding the cover to its seat.

2. In coal-ming: (a) An excavation or refuge-hole made in the side of an underground engine-plane or horse-road. [Eng.] (b) A small and generally short passage used for the ingress and egress of the miners. [Pennsylvania anthracite region.] (c) A niche cut in the side of a railroad-tunnel as a refuge-hole.

manhood (man'hūd), n. [ME. manhode (also manhod; see manhead); man + head.] 1. The state of being man, or of belonging to the human race, as distinguished from higher or lower orders of existence.

I equal to the Father as touching his godhead, and inferior to the Father as touching his manhood. Athanasian Creed (English Book of Common Prayer).

There forth thy limitation shall exalt With thee thy manhood also to this throne. Milton, P. L., iii, 312.

2. The state of being a man, as distinguished from a woman or a boy; virility.

To some shade, And fit you to your manhood. Shak., Cymbeline, iii, 4, 122.

His stately helm unbuckled show'd him prime In manhood where youth ended. Milton, P. L., xi, 248.

3. The quality of being a man or manly; manliness; possession of masculine qualities, as courage, fortitude, resolution, honor, etc.

I am exalted That thou hast power to shake my manhood thus. Shak., Lear, l. 4, 219.

Peace hath higher tent of manhood Than battle ever knew. Whittier, The Hero.

Manhood suffrage. See suffrage. — Syn. 2. Suffrage, Franchise, suffrage.

mania (ma'nī-ā), n. [Early mod. E. mania (see manic), ME. manie, OF. manie, F. manie = Sp. mania = Fr. It. mania; ML. mania, madness (a disease of cattle), NL. insanity, Gr. μανία, madness, frenzy, Quivada, rage, be mad; akin to manis, mind, manis, manis, etc.; see manis.] 1. Any form or phase of insanity with exaltation of spirits and rapidity of mental action; specifically, a psychomotoria with these as the fundamental features. In a mania in this strict sense there may be delusions, but they fall of the systematic character of those of paranoia. Delusions and hallucinations may also be present. The attack may last for days or months, or years. The prognosis is not very unfavorable. The cases range in recovery, in death by exhaustion and intercurrent disease, and a considerable proportion in permanent imbecility.

2. An eager, uncontrolled, or uncontrollable desire; as, a mania for drink; in colloquial use, a "rage" or "crave" for something; as, a mania for first editions.

In the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century, the mania for painted glass had seized on the French architects, and all architectural property was sacrificed to this mode of decoration. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., l. 128.

2. Exhibiting or embracing many points, features, or characteristics; complicated in character; having many parts or relations: used with nouns in the singular number: as, the manifold wisdom of the manifold graces of God (Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. iv. 10); "the manifold use of friendship," Bacon.

With how manifold and strong a bond
The child was bound to the father.

Shak., Lear, II. 1. 49

Manifold fugue, a fugue with more than one subject.

II. n. 1. A complicated object or subject; that which consists of many and various parts; especially, an aggregate of particulars or units; especially, in math., a multitude of objects connected by a system of relations; an ensemble. — 2. In Kant's theory of knowledge, the total of the particulars furnished by sense before they are connected by the synthetical of the understanding; that which is in the sense and has not yet been in thought.

Then, and then only, do we say that we know an object, if we have produced synthetical unity in the manifold of intuition.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller

H. (Kant) . . . tells us in the Analytic that sense only presents to us a mere manifold, which requires to be bound together in the unity of a conception ere it can be apprehended as an object.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 228.

3. A copy or facsimile made by means of a manifold-writer, or by the use of carbon paper in a type-writer, etc. — 4. A tube, usually of cast metal, with one or more flanged or screw-threaded inlets and two or more flanged or screw-threaded outlets for pipe-connections, much used in pipe-fitting for steam heating coils, or for cooling-coils in breweries, and in other cases where it is useful to convey steam, water, or air from a large pipe into several smaller ones. Also called Flange and header. Class of a manifold, in math., the multitude of an infinite manifold. A directly infinite manifold is said to belong to the first class, and a continuously infinite manifold to the second class.

Condensed manifold. See condensed. Derivative of a manifold of points. See derivative.

manifold (man'fôld), adj. [OE. manigfaltig (cf. D. manigfaltig); from the adj. manig Many times; in multiplied number or quantity.

There is no man who hath left house or parents, . . . who shall not receive manifold more. Luke xviii. 30.

manifold (man'fôld), v. t. [ME. manifolden, AS. gemanigfalden, germanigfaltian (= OHG. manigfaltan, manigfaltian, MHG. mannevalten = lecl. margfaltu = Sw. mångfaltig; cf. M.H.G. mannevalten); from the adj. manig To make manifold; multiply; specifically, to multiply impressions of, by a single operation, as a letter by means of a manifold writer, or by the use of carbon-paper in a type-writer.

manifoldly (man'fôld-lî), adv. [*ME. manigfolli, AS. manigfoldli (= lecl. margfaltig); cf. manigfaltig, manifold; see manifold.] In a manifold manner; in many ways.

manifoldness (man'fôld-nês), n. [*ME. manigfoldnes, AS. manigfoldnes, manigfold, manifold; see manifold.] 1. The state of being manifold; variety; multiplicity. — 2. In math.: (a) A manifold or ensemble; especially, a continuous quantity of any number of dimensions.

This wider conception of which space and time are particular varieties it has been proposed to denote by the term manifoldness. Whenever a general notion is susceptible of a variety of specializations, the aggregate of such specializations is called a manifoldness. Thus space is the aggregate of all points, and each point is a specialization of the general notion of position. F. W. Frankland

(b) The number of different prime factors of a number.

The total number of distinct primes which divide a given number I call its manifoldness or multiplicity. J. J. Sylvester, Nature, XXVII. 135 manifold-paper (man'fôld-pâ pâr), n. Carbonized paper used for duplicating a writing, or in a typewriting-machine.

manifold-writer (man'fôld-rî tîr), n. A preparation of oiled paper interlarded with carbonized paper, which, when written on with a hard point, transfers the impressed carbon in the form of writing to two or more sheets.

maniform (man'fôrm), a. [L. manus, the hand, + forma, form.] 1. Having the form of a hand; hand-shaped. — 2. Having the two terminal joints opposed to each other, as the pectipalp of a scorpion, chelate. Kirby.

maniglion (ma nî'yon), n. [L. maniglion, a handle of a cannon, maniglion, a bracelet; see manilla.] A handle of an early type of cannon, usually one of two handles cast with the gun. Compare dolphin, 5.

manihoti (man'i-hok), n. Same as manioc.

Manihot (man'i-hot), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763).]

1. A genus of euphorbiaceous plants of the tribe Crotoneae and the subtribe Adrianeae. The calyx of the staminate flowers has lubricated lobes and is often colored, the stamens are 16 in number and have anthers attached at the back, and the styles are spreading. They are tall herbs or shrubs, with alternate leaves which are undivided or often palmately 2 to 7-lobed or -parted, and minor veins apiculate flowers, which are quite large and grow in terminal or axillary racemes. There are about 50 species, all natives of tropical and subtropical America, several of them, however, are largely cultivated elsewhere. The genus is of great importance for the food-products derived from the roots of several species, especially M. utilissima, the bitter cassava and M. Aipi, the sweet cassava, which by some are regarded as varieties of one species. M. ilicifolia furnishes Brazilian or Ceara India-rubber. See Brugianthus arborescens under arborescens, cassava, manioc, and tapioca.

2. [L. c.] Same as maniot.

manika, n. Plural of manikin.

manikin, manakin (man'i-kin, man'a-kin), n. and a. [Also mannikin, in def. 3 sometimes maniquin; OF. maniquin, F. mannequin = Sp. maniqui, a puppet, manikin; MD. mannikin (= G. manniken, a little man, man = E. man, + dim. -ken, E. -kin, cf. mannikin). The bird Pipra manucyris was called manikin (G. hartmannschen) in allusion to the beard-like feathers on the chin.] 1. n. 1. A little man; a dwarf; a pygmy.

Pub. This is a dear manikin to you, Sir Toby.
Sir To. I have been dear to him, but some thousand strong or so. Shak., T. V. III. 2. 55.

Forth rushed the madling mannikin to arms
Heating battles of the Phœnix and the Crane.

2. A model of the human body, used for showing the structure, form, and position of the various organs, limbs, muscles, etc., or adapted and used for practicing bandaging or for performing certain obstetrical operations, as delivery with the forceps. — 3. An artists' model of the human figure. See boy-figure and manequin. — 4. A non-cosmic passerine bird of the subfamily Piprinae. Manikins are generally small, thick set, and of brilliant plumage, with few exceptions, they are natives of the hottest parts of America. They feed on vegetable and animal substances, and are lively and active in their movements. The bearded manikin, Manacus manacus, is black, with the breast, neck, and tuft of feathers on the chin white. The species are numerous, and the sexes are diverse in color and often in form, the males of many having curiously shaped wings or tails. The name sometimes extends to all the Piprinae, and to some members of the related family Cotingidae. See under Manacus. (In this sense usually manakin, conformably with the New Latin Manacus.)

II. a. Like a manikin; artificial. [Rare.] Boats, indeed, but they are live boats, not manikin shepherds. D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days (Theocritus) manikion (ma-nî'kî-on), n. [pl. manikia (-ia).] [ME. manekion, a sleeve; see epimanikion.] Same as epimanikion.

manil (ma-nîl'), n. Same as manilla 1.

manila, manilla (ma-nîl'), n. [cf. Manila (see def.).] 1. [cup.] A kind of clove-leaf manufactured in Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands. — 2. A fibrous material obtained from the leaves of Musa textilis, the abaca or abaka, a plant that grows in the Philippine Islands. Excellent ropes and cables are made from it (it is most common use), and its fiber qualities are woven into fabrics suitable for wearing apparel, sometimes of great beauty and cost. Also called Manila hemp. See Manila.

Manila copal, elemi, rope, etc. See copal, etc. manillo (ma-nîl'lo), n. [cf. Manilla, manilla, a bracelet, a handle; see manilla, manilla.] A bracelet of arm-ring, especially one of a kind worn by savages, as in Africa. Copper manillas formed a common article of barter during the early intercourse between Europeans and African tribes. See ring-money. Also manilla.

Their arms and legs chained with manillas or voluntary bracelets. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 204 manilla (ma-nîl'), n. [Sp. manilla = Pg. manilla = It. maniglia, a bracelet, ring-money, ML. manilla, a bracelet, L. manus, hand; see manus, cf. manilla, manilla.] A piece of ring-money such as was until recent times used for barter on the Guinea coast of Africa. These pieces are of copper or iron, of fixed weight, and in the present century have been manufactured in England for exportation to Africa. See manilla.

manilla (mā'ô-lā), n. [See manilla 2.] In the game of solis, the seven of trumps, the high at east but one.

manilla³, n. See manilla.

manille (mā-nîl'), n. [Also manil; OF. manille, a bracelet, a handle, L. manica = Sp. Sp. manilla, a bracelet; see manilla.] Same as manilla. Ash.

manille² (mā-nîl'), n. [cf. manilla, Sp. manilla, for manilla = Pg. manilla, a game of cards, manilla (as defined); appar. cf. mano, hand; cf. manilla.] The highest card but one in the games of ombre and quadrille. It is the two of clubs or spades, or the seven of diamonds or hearts, according as one or other of these suits is trumps, the manille always being a trump. The card, in the form Manille, is personified in the following lines:

Spadillo first, unconquerable lord!
Led off two captive trumps, and swept the board.
As many more Manillo forced to yield,
And march'd a victor from the verdant field.

Pope, R. of the L. II. 83.

Manina (mā-nî-nā), n. pl. [NL. < Manda + -ina.] Same as Manidae.

maninose (man'i-nôz), n. [Also maninose, manynose, manynose, manynose, etc.; Amer. Ind. mananoway.] The soft clam; My arenaria. [Maryland and Virginia.]

manioc (man'i-ok), n. [Also manihot, manihot, maniocca; = Sp. Pg. mandioca; of Braz. origin.] The cassava-plant or its product. The manioc or cassava is a very important food-staple in tropical America. The tubers of Manihot utilissima, sometimes weighing forty pounds, must be grated to a pulp and submitted to pressure in order to remove a deleterious juice. Those of M. Aipi may be used as an excellent vegetable like potatoes. The South American natives also prepare from manioc an intoxicating drink called piacaria. Also mandio, mandioca.

maniocca (man-i-ok'kâ), n. See manioc.

maniple (man'i-pl), n. [OF. manipe, F. manipule = Sp. manipulo = Pg. manipulo = It. manipulo, manipulo, L. manipulus, a handful, a bundle; also (because it is said, a bundle of hay was tied to the military standards), a number of soldiers belonging to the same standard, a company, Manus, the hand, + -pulus, akin to E. pull; see pull.] 1. A handful. [Rare.]

I have seen him wait at court there with his maniples
Of papers and petitions.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, I. 1.

Do thou pluck a maniple that is, an handful — of the plant called Maldenbat, and make a syrup therewith as I have shewed thee. O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 282.

2. In Rom. antiq., a military company consisting normally of 120 men in three out of the four classes of infantry (velites, hastati, and principes), and of 60 men in the fourth (triarii), with two (first and second) centurions and a standard-bearer. Three maniples constituted a cohort.

The enemy were actually inside before the few maniples who were left there were able to collect and resist them. Proudhon, Comm., p. 317.

Hence — 3. A company or any small body of soldiers.

The Reteward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, consisting of two thousand mingled Weapons, with two Wings of Horse men, containing fifteen hundred, all of them cast into square Maniples. Baker, Chronicles, p. 232.

Ford! he sees not the firm root out of which we all grow though into brain-herbs, nor will he aware until hee see our small divided maniples cutting through at every angle of his ill united and unwieldy brigade. Milton, Atropogitia, p. 48.

4. In the Western Church, one of the eucharistic vestments, consisting of a short, narrow strip, similar in material, width, and color to the stole. It is marked with a cross and generally embroidered and fringed. The maniple is worn by priests, priests, deacons, and subdeacons, hanging from the left sleeve of the alb, fastened near the wrist, or attached by strings, pins, or a button. It is assumed by the celebrant after the alb and girdle, and before the stole. A bishop assumes it at the Indulgendum. In Anglican churches maniples are worn, as in the medieval church, three or four feet in length, in the Roman Catholic Church they are now much shorter. The maniple seems to have first come into use in the eighth century, and was originally a piece of white linen used as a handkerchief. Till the twelfth century and later it continued to be held in the hand. There is no corresponding vestment in the Eastern Church, though some writers have confounded the epimanikion with it. Other names formerly given to the maniple were functio, phorum, manile, manderivum, mappula or mappa, and andarium.

maniples, n. sing. and pl. See manipules.

manipular (mā-nîp'û-lâr), a. [= F. manipulare = It. (obs.) manipulare, manipolare, L. manipularis, of or belonging to a maniple or company, cf. manipulus, a handful, a military company; see maniple.] 1. Of or pertaining to handling or manipulation, either literally or figuratively.

Mr. Squills . . . began mending it (the pen) furiously — that is, cutting it into shivers — thereby denoting symbolically how he would like to do with I acle Jack, could he once get him safe and sang under his manipular operations. Bulwer, Arcton, II. 7.

What the former age has epitomized into a formula or rule for manipular convenience, the latter will have all the good of verifying for itself. Emerson, History.

2. Of or pertaining to a maniple or company of soldiers; as, the manipular system of Roman tactics.

manipulate (mā-nîp'û-lât), v. t. and pp. manipulated, ppr. manipulating. [cf. ML. manipularis, pp. of manipulare (= It. manipolare = man-midwife (man'mid'wif), n. A man who practices obstetrics; an accoucheur.

man-milliner (man'mil'i-nér), n. A milliner of the male sex; especially, one who undertakes the manufacture of women's bonnets, etc., employing others to do the work.

An empty pated fellow, and as conceited as a young bull.

MANNA (man'á), n. [ME. manna, manum; AS. manna, monna; D. G. Dan, Sw. Goth. manna = F. manne; Sp. maná = Pg. manna, manna = It. manna; L. manna, f. (Phny), f. (Vulg.) manum, and man, neut. or indeclinable, < Gr. pápan, a concrete vegetable excretion, a grain, in the Old Testament manná, < Heb. man (= Ar. manna), manna, described, as found by the Israelites, as "a small round thing, as small as the hour frost on the ground. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna [in the Vulgate: "Manná" quod significat: Quid est hoc?]; for they did not what it was" (Ex. xvi. 14, 15), implying that the name thus arose from the question, Heb. man hu, 'what is this?'; but this is doubtless a popular etymology. The name is otherwise referred to Heb. man, a gift, Ar. manna, favor.] 1. The food by which the children of Israel were sustained in the wilderness (Ex. xvi. 14-36; Num. xi. 6, 7). The circumstance attending the gift of manna show that it was believed to be miraculous. Modern commentators differ in opinion as to its probable nature: by some it is identified with an excretion of the tamarisk tree, and by others with a lichen which, torn from its home and carried vast distances by the wind, still falls and is gathered for food in the shallow petioles of manna lehen, and by others it is regarded as a special and miraculous creation.

And the house of Israel called the name thereof Manna and it was like coriander seed, white, and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey.

Each morning on the ground
Not common dew, but Manna, old abound Substance, fit for the Barbaque Weeks, it, Eden.
Hence — 2. Delicious food for either the body or the mind; delectable material for nourishment or entertainment.

His tongue
Dropp'd manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash Maturing counsels.

Mino was an angel's portion then,
And, while I fed with sugar haste,
The food was manna to my taste.
J. Montgomery, A Poor Wayfaring Man of Witle.

3. Divine or spiritual food.
Thou Manna, which from Heaven we eat,
To every Taste a sweetest Mead!
Conley, The Mistress, For Hope.

4. In phar., a sweet concrete juice obtained by incisions made in the stem of Fraxinus Ornus, a native of Sicily, Calabria, and other parts of the south of Europe, and from other species of ash. It is either naturally concreted or exsiccated and purified by art. At the present day the manna of commerce is collected exclusively in Sicily, where the manna ash is cultivated for the purpose in regular plantations. The best manna is in oblong pieces or flakes of a whitish or pale-yellow color, light, friable and somewhat transparent. It has a slight peculiar odor and a sweetish taste mixed with a slight degree of bitterness, and is employed as a gentle laxative for children or persons of weak habit. It is, however, generally used as an adjunct to other more active medicines. It consists principally of a crystallizable sweet substance named mannite, and certain other substances in smaller quantity. Sweetish secretions exuded by some other plants growing in warm and dry climates, as the Acacia gummifera, the manna gumtree of Australia, and the Commersonia glandulosa, var. mannifera, at Arabia and Syria, are also considered to be kinds of manna. Small quantities of manna, known as Brasilia manna, are obtained from the common larch, Taxus Picea. Jews' or Hebrew manna, manna of Sinai. (a) An excretion from the leguminous bush called camel's thorn, Gagea cynodonta (including G. mucronata). See Albani and camel's thorn. (b) The secretion of the tamarisk, Tamarix gallica, var. mannifera. It is a honey-like liquid which exudes from punctures made by an insect, hardens on the stems, and drops to the ground. It is collected by the Arabs as a delicacy. — Madagascar manna. Same as delicata. Persian manna. Same as Jews' manna (q). Poland or Polish manna. Same as mannite.

MANNA-ASH (man'pash), n. A tree, Fraxinus Ornus. See ash and manna.

MANNA-CROUP (man'g-krip), n. See semolina.
MANNAEAD (man'ád), n. [Guana + -ad] Honeyed. hickory.

And each for some base interest of his own,
With flattery swears a lip as well as the throne.
Macfarlane, The Cause of the Cause.

MANNA-GRASS (man'g-rás), n. The sweet-scented grass Glyceria fluitans. The name is sometimes extended to the genus. See grass.

MANNA-GUMTREE (man'g-gum'tré), n. An Australian tree, Eucalyptus crumalis, which yields a crumb-like milky manna.

MANNA-LICHEN (man'h-í'ken), n. One of several species of lichens, particularly Lecanora esculenta and L. affinis. See Lecanora.

MANNA-SEEDS (man'h-sédz), n. pl. The seeds of the manna-grass. See Glyceria.

MANNER (man'ér), n. [Early mod. E. maner; ME. maner, manere = OFries. maniere, maneri = MD. manere, D. manier = MHG. maniere, G. manier = Sw. manér = Dan. manier, < OF. manere, manere, manere, F. manere = Pr. manera = Sp. manerit = Pg. manera = It. manera (ML. reflex maneria, manneria, maneries), manner, habit; prop. term. of the adj., OF. maner = Pr. maner = Sp. manero, < ML. "manarius" for manarius, of or belonging to the hand (as a noun, manarius, a manual laborer; hence with ref. to the way of handling or doing a thing), < L. manua (manu-), hand; see manus.] (Cf. manual.) 1. The way in which an action is performed; method of doing anything; mode of proceeding in any case or situation; mode; way; method. Thus Harkyn the actf man hadle vool'd his cote, Til Conscience scowp'd hym therof in a wylde chace.
Piers Plowman (B), xiii. 430.

As it is in manner as I sette afore Book of Quatre Ventes (ed. Furnivall), p. 16.

For the husbanding of these Mountains, their manner was to gather up the stones, and place them in several lines along the sides of the Hills, to form of a Wall.

After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name.
Mat. vi. 9.

I do not much dislike the matter, but
The manner of his speech.
Shak. A and C, ii. 2. 114.

2. Habitual practice; customary mode of acting or proceeding with respect to anything; characteristic way or style, as in art or literature; distinctive method; habit; style; as, one's manner of life; the manner of Titian, or of Dickens.

In Cipe is the manere of Lords and alle others Men, alle to cten on the Erthe.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 29.

A good manner than I had Robyn,
In kinde where that he were,
Every day or he woulde dye
There mounes woulde he be.

Lucretius of Robyn Hood (ed. Halliwell), v. 40.
Paul, as his maner was, went in unto them.
Acts xvii.

He who can vary his manner to suit the occasion is the great dramatist, but he who exerts in one manner only will when that manner happens to be appropriate, appear to be a great dramatist.
Mandeville, Dryden.

The manner of the painters of the fifteenth century was often shackled and cramped by difficulties which have long since been broken away, and by ignorance which has long since yielded to knowledge.
C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 6.

3. Personal bearing or behavior; customary conduct; characteristic way of acting; wonted deportment or demeanor; most commonly in the plural; as, his manners were abrupt; good or bad manners; reformation of manners in a community.

All his manners so well it did her place,
That she contrived way in a ceteris
To lodge him best, it wold none other be.
Geometria, F. L. T. S. V. 1. 69.

Of corrupted man is springing perverted judgments
Locke, The Scholmaster, p. 28.

Evil communications corrupt good manners.
1 Cor. xv. 33.

Or and maner are more expressive than words.
Richardson, Charles Harlow.

Specifically — 4. pl. Good behavior; polite deportment; habitual practice of civility; commendable habits of conduct; as, have you no manners?

Fit for the mountains, and barbarous caves,
Where manners ne'er were pressed.
Shak. T. S. iv. 1. 53.

Good manners is the art of making those people easy with whom we converse.
By manners I do not mean polite but behaviour and good breeding, as they show themselves in the town and in the country.
Arden, Country Manners.

5. The way in which anything is made or constituted; mode of forming or formation; fashion; character; sort; kind; often used with all in a plural sense, equivalent to sorts or kinds; as, all manner of baked meats. [Obsolete or archaic.]

There dwellen savages and another manner of folk, that none can best describe.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 230.

As maner of men, the more so I th. riche,
As maner of men, the more so I th. riche,
Piers Plowman (B), lxxv. 1. 19.

They cannot tell the people the manner of the king in and waste it in a book.
1 Sam. x. 25.

What manner of man are you?

Shak. Hen. VIII., v. 1. 118.

The word in this sense is frequently used in old English without of following, in a quasi adjective use, like kind of in modern English; as, maner folk, kind of people; maner crime, kind of crime, etc.

26. If any Man do therefore say maner Metalle, it turneth anon to Glasse.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 22.

There was to her no maner letter sent
That touched love, from any maner knight,
That she ne shewed hit him or hit was sent.
Chaucer, Apollis and Arctis, l. 118.

Wherby the kinges peas may in any maner wise be broken or hurt.
English Bible (R. E. T. A.), p. 432.

Right hard it was for wight which did it heare
To read what manner musicks that mote be.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xli. 70.

By no manner of means. See means. — Dotted manner. See dot. — In a manner, in a certain degree, measure, or sense; to a certain extent.

The bread is in a manner common. 1 Sam. xxi. 6.

'Tis not a time to pity passionate grief,
When a whole kingdom in a manner lies Upon its death-bed bleeding.
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, l. 1.

Shak's manners, greediness; rapacity; extreme selfishness. [Naut. slang.] — To make one's manners, to salute a person on meeting, usually by a bow or courtesy; said of children. [Prov. Eng., and formerly New Eng.]

I humbly make my manners, manners.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lover, II.

To the manner born, accustomed to some practice or mode from birth; having lifelong familiarity with the thing mentioned.

But to my mind — though I am native here,
And to the manner born — it is a custom
More honour'd in the breach than the observance.
Shak. Hamlet, I. 4. 15.

Manner here is sometimes understood as maner (which was formerly also spelled manner), and is often changed to maner in the quotation to make the phrase applicable to beauty. — Syn. 1. Manner, Mode, Method, Way. Manner is the least precise of these words, standing for art or kind, custom, mode, method, or the like. Mode may mean a fashion, or a form or sort, as a mode of existence, or a single act or an established way, as a mode of disposing of a case. Method implies a succession of acts tending to an end, as a method of slaughtering an ox or of solving a problem. Way is a very general word, in large popular use for each of the others, as a man's way of building a dam (method), of holding a pen (mode), of starting at strangers (manner). 2. Habit, Usage, etc. See custom. — 3. Manners, Morals, etc. See morality.

MANNER (man'ér), n. An obsolete form of manor.
MANNER (man'ér), n. Another form of manor.
MANNERABLE (man'ér-á-bil), a. [ME. maner-able, < maner + -able.] Well-trained; versed on good manners.

In a *maner*able maner the connyage is most commendable.

I have a few sight to strangers, to tell them at the table.
Robertson (E. E. T. A.), p. 101.

MANNERCHOR (men'ér-chor), n. [*G. L. *männer, pl. of maner, man, + chor, chorus; see man and chorus.] A German singing-society or chorus composed exclusively of men.

MANNERED (man'ér-éd), a. [ME. manered; < maner + -ed.] 1. Having or possessed of manners, carriage, or demeanor; in compounds, having manners of a certain kind, as in ill-mannered, well-mannered.

And Mele ys mannered after hym Piers Plowman (C), iii. 27.

Athenaeum, April 1, 1892.

The defective proportions of the forms, and the mannered attitude of the principal figure.
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 22.

MANNERISM (man'ér-izm), n. [maner + -ism.] 1. Monotonous, formal, or pedantic adherence to the same manner; uniformity of manner, especially a tasteless uniformity, without freedom or variety; excessive adherence to a characteristic mode, or manner of action or treatment.

Mannerism is pardonable, and is sometimes even agreeable, when the manner, though vicious, is natural.
Macaulay, Roswell's Johnson.

The secondary intellect . . . seeks for excitement in expression and stimulates itself into mannerism, which is the wilful obtrusion of self, as style is its unconscious obtrusion.
Lowell, Among my Books, II. ser., p. 141.

2. A peculiarity of manner in deportment, speech, or execution; an exceptionally characteristic mode or method; an idiosyncrasy.

The seated passengers . . . remained in mannerism, so that their mannerisms and facial peculiarities were sharply defined to the public eye.

A dwelling; habitation.

To the house of, once and all,
Hail come his manor principal
In his, that was his resting place.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 1004.

2. In England, generally, a landed estate, especially one the tenure of which vests the proprietor with some particular rights of lordship; specifically, in old law, a lordship or barony held by a lord and subject to the jurisdiction of a court-baron held by him; in more ancient usage, an estate of a lord or thine with a village community, generally in serfdom, upon it. See villanage and yard-land.

In the 11th year of his reign in September was born to the king a son, called Rikard, at Oxford in his manor, where is now the white tower.

John of Gloucester, p. 181, note.

These manors (those with which England was covered about the time of the Domesday Survey) were in fact in their simplest form estates of manorial lands, each with its village community in villanage upon it. The land of the lord's demesne—the home farm belonging to the manor house—was utilized chiefly by the services of the villans, i. e. of the village community or tenants in villanage. The land of this village community, i. e. the land in villanage, lay round the village in open fields. In the villages were the messuages, or homesteads of the tenants in villanage, and their holdings were composed of bundles of scattered strips in the open fields, with rights of pasture over the latter for their cattle after the crops were gathered, as well as on the green commons of the manor or township.

Seebohm, Eng. Vill. Community, p. 76.

On close inspection, all feudal society is seen to be a reproduction of a single typical form. This unit consists of a group of men settled on a definite space of land, and forming what we Englishmen call a Manor, and what in France was called a Feud.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 302.

The name manor is of Norman origin, but the estate to which it was given existed, in its essential character, long before the Conquest. It received a new name as the shire also did, but neither the one nor the other was created by this change.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 98.

3. The jurisdiction of a court baron or court of the lord of a manor.—4. In some of the United States formed by English colonies, a tract of land occupied or once occupied by tenants paying a fee-farm rent to the proprietor, sometimes in kind, and sometimes in stipulated services. Harrill. In colonial times these resembled the old English manors, their possession being in most cases accompanied by jurisdiction.

manucode (man-'q-kód), n. [< Manucodia.] A bird of Paradise of the genus Manucodia of Boddard; a chalybeate. The term has also been used for some of the true birds of Paradise of the genus Paradisa of Linnaeus or Manophala of Brisson.

Manucodia (man-'u-ko-'dî-wî), n. [NL. (Boddard, 1783), a misprint for Manucodina, q. v.] A genus of sturnoid passerine birds, either included in the family Paradiseidae or placed in Sturnidae, and typical of a subfamily Manucodinae (also called Phonygama by Lesson in 1828, and Chalybeata by Cuvier in 1829); the manucodes, or chalybeates. There are several species of these beautiful birds, with glossy blue-black plumage inhabiting the Papuan region, or New Guinea and the islands ecologically related to it. The longest and best-known of these is M. coronata, called M. chalybeata by Boddard, and Chalybeata paradisiaca by Cuvier. M. acronota (Lesson), M. goodii (Gray), M. ultra-classica, M. parvifrons (F. monilich), M. maculosa (Chapuis), and M. obscura (Barnard) are others; the last three form a separate subgenus called Egypocora by Bonaparte in 1845.

manucodiata (man-'u-ko-'dî-wî), n. [NL., from a Malay name manuk denata, a bird of Paradise, lit. 'bird of the gods.' Cf. manuk.] 1. An old and disused name for a bird of Paradise.

The male and female Manucodiata read manucodiata? the male having a hollow in the back, to which it is reported the female both lays and hatches her eggs.

Edwin, Diary, Feb. 4, 1615.

2. [cap.] A genus of Paradise birds established by Brisson in 1760, equivalent to the Linnaean genus Paradisa. Two species were included by Brisson under this generic name, Manucodiata major and M. minor, corresponding respectively to the Paradisa apoda and P. regia of Linnaeus in either of which pertains to the later genus Manucodia. [Not in use.]

Manucodinae (man-'u-ko-'dî-wî), n. pl. [NL., < Manucodia + -inae.] A subfamily of birds named by Cabanis in 1847 from the genus Manucodia. The term is little used, but by G. R. Gray (1870) it is employed for a subfamily of Sturnidae composed of the two genera Adaptus and Manucodia.

Maranta (má-rán'tá), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after B. Maranta, a Venetian physician and botanist of the 16th century.] 1. A genus of monocotyledonous plants of the natural order Zingiberaceae, type of the tribe Marantae. It is distinguished by the one-celled ovary, the slender branched inflorescence, and the narrow involucre bracts, closely surrounding the branches. They are herbaceous plants with fleshy tubers, sheathing leaves, and a few-flowered inflorescence, the flowers having a cylindrical corolla-tube, and a petaloid filament bearing a one-celled anther. There are about 15 species, indigenous to tropical America, but several species are widely cultivated for their fleshy tubers. The pure kind of starch known as arrow-root is obtained from the tubers of M. arundinacea and of several other species by maceration, washing, and drying. (See arrow-root.) Several species have highly ornamental foliage, as M. (Crotalaria) coccinea, the cobra-plant, whose leaves are 2 feet long and 6 inches wide, of a deep rich green, purple shaded, and with a velvety appearance. See also Maranta glabra.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Marantaceae (mar-an-tá'sé-é), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1823), Maranta + -aceae.] An old order of plants, typified by the genus Maranta, now included in the natural order Zingiberaceae, and nearly equivalent to the two tribes Marantae and Cannae.

marantaceous (mar-an-tá'shíus), a. Of, pertaining to, or resembling plants of the Marantaceae (Marantae).

Marantes (má-rán'té-é), n. pl. [NL. (Benthams and Hooker, 1833), Maranta + -es.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants of the natural order Zingiberaceae, the ginger family. The cells of the ovary have but one ovule, and the embryo is much curved. The tribe contains 19 genera, of which Maranta is the type, and about 150 species, all natives of the tropics.

marant, n. An obsolete form of mariah.

marasca (má-rá'ská), n. [Fr. marasca, amarusca, a black, hard, sour cherry, griot (marasca, amarasca, the tree), marasca, amarasca, cherry-wine, camara, bitter, sour, L. amarus, bitter.] A small black wild cherry, a variety of Prunus avium, from which maraschino is distilled.

maraschino (má-rá'shí-no), n. [Also Maraschino (Sp. maraschino) and marasquin (F. marasquin); Fr. maraschino, marasca, a kind of cherry; see marasca.] A cordial originating in Dalmatia, where it is distilled from or flavored with the marasca cherry, peculiar to that region; hence, a similar cordial produced in other regions from other kinds of cherry. The first bears the name of maraschino of Zara, in which town it is reputed to be manufactured.

marasmic (má-rá'smík), a. [marasmus (see) + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to marasmus; affected with marasmus; as, a marasmic tendency; a marasmic patient.

Marasmus (má-rá'smí-um), n. [NL. (Fries, 1833), Gr. marasmus, a wasting, withering, from the fact that the species are not putrescent, but dry or wither up with drought.] A large genus of acuminous fungi, having a tough leathery pulvis, which dries up with drought and is revived again on the application of water. The spores are white, and subelliptical in shape. About 20 species are known, of which number many are edible. M. oreades is the English champion of fairy-ring mushrooms. See champion.

marasmoid (má-rá'smí-oid), a. [marasmus (see) + -oid.] Resembling or affected with marasmus.

marasmus (má-rá'smí-um), n. [See Marasmus.] Sp. marasmus, NL. marasmus, Gr. marasmus, a wasting, withering, decay, Gr. marasmus, put out, quenched, weakened, cause to pine or waste away.] In pathol., a wasting of the flesh. The term is usually restricted to cases in which the cause of the wasting is obscure.

Pining atrophy, Marasmus, and wide wasting, pathol. Edison, P. L., xi. 487.

manure (ma-nūr'), n. [< manure, v.] Any substance added to the soil with the view of rendering it more fertile; specifically, and as used in leases and other contracts relating to real property, the excrementitious product of live stock, with refuse litter, accumulated, and used for enriching the land. Animal substances employed as manures comprehend the putrefying excrements of animals, ground bones, blood, the excrements of animals, as the dung of horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, etc., urine, guano (the decomposed excrement of aquatic birds also of bats), the scrapings of leather and horn, the refuse of the shambles, the hair or wool of animals, etc. Liquid manures, consisting of town sewage, the drainings of dung-heaps, stable, and cow-houses, etc., are largely employed in many places. Almost every kind of vegetable substance, in one state or another, is used as manure. The principal mineral matters employed as manures are lime and other alkaline substances, chalk, sand, clay, marl, various sulphates, phosphates, nitrates, etc.

manure-distributor (ma-nūr'-dis-trib'-ū-tēr), n. An agricultural machine for spreading a layer of manure evenly over the ground.

manure-drag (ma-nūr'-drag), n. In agri., a horse-fork with curved tines projecting downward, used for hauling manure from a wagon in unloading, for dragging it to a place convenient for piling or loading, or for distributing over a field and harrowing in manure that has been dumped in heaps. Also called manure-hook.

manure-drill (ma-nūr'-dril), n. In agri.: (a) An attachment to a grain-drill which deposits powdered manure either in the seed-row or broadcast, as may be desired. (b) A form of watering-cart for distributing in streams over the surface of a field liquid manure carried in the box of the vehicle. E. H. Knight.

manure-fork (ma-nūr'-fōrk), n. A fork, usually with four flat prongs, used for lifting and distributing manure.

manure-hook (ma-nūr'-hūk), n. In agri.: (a) Same as manure-drag. (b) A hand-instrument used for the same purposes as the manure-drag.

manure-loader (ma-nūr'-lō'-dēr), n. A form of horse-fork for loading into a wagon large bunches of stable-manure. F. H. Knight.

manurement (ma-nūr'-ment), n. [< manure + -ment.] The art or process of manuring or cultivating; cultivation. See H. Wotton, Reliquie, p. 76.

manurer (ma-nūr'-ēr), n. One who manures lands.

Manuria (mā-nū'-ri-ā), n. [NL., from an E. Ind. name.] 1. A genus of turtles, typical of the subfamily Manuriana. Also Manouria. — 2. [l. c.] A land-tortoise of this genus, Manuria fusa, inhabiting parts of the hill-country of India. In some respects it resembles a fresh-water turtle of the family Clemmydidae. The plastron has ten plates, disposed in five pairs; the two pectoral shields are small, angular, and removed toward the sides at the hinder edge of the axilla.

manurial (ma-nū'-ri-āl), a. [< manure + -ial.] Of or pertaining to manure; serving for manure; fertilizing: as, the manurial value of phosphates.

To maintain its good tillth by the manurial products which it is now capable of supplying.

J. R. Nichols, Firmale Science, p. 104.

manurially (ma-nū'-ri-āl-i), adv. As regards manure or its production.

Manuriana (mā-nū'-ri-an-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Manuria + -ana.] In Gray's system of classification, a subfamily of Testudinidae, typified by the genus Manuria, including two Indian species of separate genera, more like the fresh-water tortoises than the other Testudinidae. Also Manouriana.

manus (mā'-nus), n.; pl. manus. [L., the hand, hence power: see main, manual, etc.] 1. The hand. Technically, in soil and const. (a) The distal segment of the fore limb of a vertebrate animal, including all beyond the forearm or fore leg (antibrachium). It is divided into three segments, the carpus, the metacarpus, and the phalanges. See hand. (The word is used to avoid the implication of any difference between "hand" as of a man and "fore foot" as of a quadruped; it is chiefly a morphological term, opposed to pes, which is the corresponding segment of the hind limb. Sometimes called pro-entia.) (b) The prehensile organ of a crustacean; the chela or great oblique claw, as of a lobster. (c) In entom., the tarsus of the anterior leg. Kirby. (d) In zool., the postural fin.

2. In Rom. law: (a) Same as dominium, but more commonly used of power over persons. Old blind Appius Claudius, or old (into the censor, was not stronger than the young men who were in his manes; and yet both of them ruled their respective households with absolute sway. W. E. Harris, Arrian Household, p. 28. (b) More specifically, the power of a Roman husband over his wife: as, in manu (of a woman), under the marital authority.

Written with the hand; in handwriting (not printed).

In a manuscript account of the building of the palace, it is mentioned that at the entrance were two columns. E. A. Freeman, Viking, p. 260.

2. Consisting of writings or written books. He expended upwards of £300 in arranging and improving the manuscript library at Lambeth.

Sp. Porteus, Alp. Secken, p. 65.

II. n. 1. A book, paper, or instrument written by hand with ink or other pigment, or with a pencil or the like; a writing of any kind, as distinguished from anything that is printed. Especially — 2. Such a book, paper, or instrument so written before the introduction and general adoption of printing in the fifteenth century, or in a style in vogue before the invention of printing. The oldest surviving manuscripts are Egyptian, of which some are at least 3,000 years old. Ancient manuscripts are written on papyrus, parchment, or vellum, and are usually in the form of a long band which was rolled for convenience about a rod. Greek manuscripts are in uncial, cursive, or minuscule characters. The uncial characters are derived from the uncials, though they came to differ much from these in shape, and are used in manuscripts from the second century before Christ. The minuscule writing is that practiced with few or no exceptions since the fifth century; the forms of the earliest printed Greek closely resemble it. Latin manuscripts are in capital, uncial, cursive, or minuscule characters. The capitals are the earliest form, but their use was not entirely discontinued until the Carolingian epoch. The uncials, of which the letters are characterized by their rounded shape, were developed very early, attained their highest perfection in the fourth century, and continued in use until the ninth century. The cursive writing was developed from the uncial. It appears in the graffiti found scratched on the walls of Pompeii, Rome, etc., and is the parent of many old systems of writing, as the Lombard and Merovingian. The minuscule style was developed in the eighth century, in the monastery of St. Martin at Tours, and reached its perfection in the twelfth century. In this style are written the splendid manuscripts of the middle ages, produced for the most part in monasteries, and enriched with superbly illuminated initial letters and elaborately painted miniatures. Upon the introduction of printing, the minuscule writing supplanted the uncial and cursive. Palimpsest manuscripts are manuscripts written in antiquity or in the early middle ages upon papyrus or vellum from which earlier writing had been erased. Modern science has been successful in deciphering the imperfectly effaced characters of many such manuscripts and has recovered in this way some of our most valuable remnants of classic literature. The three most important Biblical manuscripts extant are the Alexandrian Codex, the Vatican Codex, and the Sinaitic Codex. (See codex.) These are of course all uncials. See capital, cursive, majuscule, minuscule, uncial often abbreviated M.S., plural MSS.

Marattia (ma-rat'-i-ā), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1806), named after J. P. Maratti of Vallombrosa in Tuscany, a writer on ferns.] A genus of ferns, typical of the order Marattiaceae. They are coarse habited plants, having large aculear rhizomes and simple two- or three-pinnate fronds, with oblong pinnules, bearing the sori in lines near the margin. Many fossil ferns showing both fronds and fructification closely resembling those of this genus occur, chiefly in Triassic (Rhetian) strata, and were called Marattopsis by Schimper, who united with that genus all the forms which had been called Angiopteridium, since found very abundant in the Mesozoic beds of India, and quite recently in the Potomac formation of Virginia.

Marattiaceae (ma-rat'-i-ā-sē-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Kaulfuss, 1824), Marattia + -aceae.] An order of esporangiate ferns, typified by the genus Marattia. They are found in South America, the eastern Pacific islands, South Africa, and southern Asia. They differ from the true ferns on the one hand by the absence of the pinnate ring of the sporangia, and from the Ophioglossaceae on the other by the tri-lateral venation. By some authors they are regarded as a distinct class, of equal rank with the true Filices and Ophioglossae. Called Danaeaceae by Agardh.

Limestone in a more or less crystalline or crystalline-granular condition. Any limestone, however, even if very compact or showing only traces of a crystalline structure, may be called marble if it is capable of taking a polish, or if it is suitable or desirable for ornamental and decorative purposes. The presence of magnesian carbonate associated with the calcium carbonate, forming dolomitic limestone or even pure dolomite, does not in any way influence the nomenclature of the rock. Indeed, such presence cannot usually be known except from chemical analysis. Marble is a material of great importance in architecture, not only for exterior use, but for interior decoration in large, costly monumental structures. Thirty-three varieties of ornamental stone are used in the interior of the Grand Opera House in Paris, and a large proportion of these may be classed as marbles. The color and beauty of marble depend largely on its composition. Perfectly pure carbonate of lime, dolomite limestone and dolomite are all colorless, and white marbles — or at least such as are only slightly tinged with color — are very abundant. White marble such as is used for statuary (for which purpose it must be obtained in large blocks free from flaws or defects of any kind, and perfectly uniform in tint) is extremely rare. Among the first class of marble are those used in the masterpieces of Greek sculpture, of which that from the island of Paros is generally admitted to surpass all others, especially in the possession of a certain amount of translucence by which the artistic effect of the work is heightened. The Parian quarries seem, however, to have been practically exhausted. The Pontic marble, obtained from quarries near Athens, stood next to the Parian in ancient times, and its quarries are still apparently inexhaustible. At the present time the artistic world is supplied with statuary marble from quarries in the Apennine mountains overlooking the Bay of Spezia, and in the vicinity of Carrara, Massa, and Serravalle. From this marble were carved the finest works of Michelangelo. These quarries, which have been extensively worked for 2000 years, furnish, in addition to the white, a large amount of variegated marble, especially of the variety known as marble. The number and variety of colored and variegated marbles used for various artistic and architectural purposes is very great. Entirely black marble capable of taking a fine polish is rare, much more common are varieties irregularly shaded with gray, bluish gray, or dove-colored tints. Bright colors — red, yellow, green, and blue — are much rarer than the less brilliant shades, but they are seen in some marbles, and are occasionally so blended and intermingled as to produce extremely beautiful effects. These brilliant colorations are chiefly due to the presence of iron in various combinations, dark and grayish shades are generally caused by the presence of a greater or less amount of organic matter. In many varieties of marble the presence of organic remains embedded in the rock adds greatly to its attractiveness. Joints and stems of corallines as well as many other kinds of fossils, occur in this way, and by contrast of the color with that of the material in which they are included, as well as by the gracefulness of their forms, produce a very fine effect. Fragments of shells embedded in calcareous rocks sometimes exhibit a brilliant display of iridescent coloration, such marbles are known as luna shells, or, sometimes, peacock. A beautiful effect is occasionally produced as the result of deposition of the calcareous material in stalagmitic form, so that when cut and polished the marble exhibits concentric zones of various tints, such as having this structure are frequently called onyx marble. The vicinity of the Mediterranean is the classic region of marbles. Italy, France, and Spain are rich in beautiful varieties, and these are seen in the greatest number and to the best advantage in the architectural works of ancient and modern Rome. For this reason many of the rarest and most attractive marbles are best known by Italian names, and these names are frequently applied to varieties occurring far away from the Mediterranean. Some of the best known and most highly prized classic variegated marbles are the following. Africane, from the island of Chios, is a lunatic marble, or shell-marble, exhibiting a great variety and brilliancy of coloration, reddish and purplish tints predominating. Paros is common in the Apennine quarries of a grayish or bluish white, also traversed by darker veins of the same kind, and brecciated are extremely variegated marbles, with numerous interlacing veins of yellow, violet, and crimson tints on a yellowish ground, marble bearing these designations has been and still is quarried in various places and especially near Tortona in Spain. Cyprian is a marble with more or less of a concentric structure of many tints and much variety in their arrangement, with corresponding names, such as capriccio marble, mandarin (having almost shaped patches of color), rose, etc. A fine example of this marble may be seen in the columns of the Palazzo Nuovo of the Vatican. Flavian is an exquisitely beautiful marble with a reddish and crimson shading on a white base, called by the ancients marbre Flavian, because coming from the region inhabited by the Flavians, in what is now Albania, on the eastern coast of the Adriatic. Chalcidic and Numidian marble is an extremely beautiful marble quarried in northern Africa; it was highly esteemed and extensively used by the Romans. The tints are variable, red and yellow predominating; the different varieties were designated by names indicating the prevailing tints. Giallo di Siena is a beautiful yellow marble of various depths of color, with darker veins, in which violet hues predominate; when these veins are very numerous the marble becomes a brecciated. Pavonazzo and pavonazzo are various red and purplish marbles and breccias, some of the latter being also true marbles, but having a more or less brecciated character. The most beautiful pavonazzo, that called by the Romans marmor hyndicum or Phrygian marble, from the locality where it was obtained; it is characterized by a very irregular venation of dark red with bluish and yellowish tints, ramifying through a translucent alabaster-like base, which is sometimes almost opaline in its play of colors. Rossaccio is a marble of very deep red color, sometimes of various shades, occasionally streaked or clouded with dark purple or whitish tints. The original locality of the classic rosso antico has not been discovered, but some modern red marbles closely resemble this variety. Some of the most highly prized French colored marbles bear names peculiar to France. (see griotte, portor, verruccello.) The Devonian and Carboniferous of England and Ireland furnish a considerable number of ornamental marbles. Devonshire and Derbyshire are the counties in which the best-known English varieties are obtained. The finest Irish variegated marbles are quarried near Armagh, and at various localities in county Cork, also at Killarney, and on the islands of the Kenmare river; and marble called Slieve is obtained from several places in King's county and near Shannon Harbor in Galway. The most important quarries of white and grayish marble in the United States are those in the Lower Silurian of Vermont and western Massachusetts. There are very extensive marble-works at Rutland in Vermont, at Lee in Massachusetts, and at many other points in the same geological formation. Some of the variegated marbles found on the islands and near the shores of Lake Champlain are very handsome, but they are not extensively worked. The most popular colored marble in the United States at the present time is the Tennessee, a light-grayish stone beautifully mottled with shades of pinkish red. This marble has been extensively employed in the capitals at Washington and Albany.

The most valuable object in this collection is the inscribed slab called the Parian Chronicle, from having been kept in the island of Paros. In its perfect state, the inscription contained a chronicle of the principal events in Grecian history from the time of the mythical Ceres to the death of Diogenes (334 B. C.); but the part of it covering the last ninety years is now lost, and much of what remains is corroded and defaced. — Elgin marbles, a collection of ancient sculptures, for the most part of the school of Phidias and from the Parthenon at Athens, taken to England during the first years of the nineteenth century by the Earl of Elgin, and now preserved in the British Museum.

These sculptures are the finest surviving work of ancient artists, and comprise the greatest part now in existence of the sculptured decoration of the Parthenon, including the splendid fragments of the pediment statues, a great number of metopes, and an extended series of the blocks carved in low relief of the acilla frieze. The removal of the marbles, many of which were torn violently from their original positions upon the Parthenon, by the further damage of that monument, was in itself an act of vandalism, but their transportation to England at a time when Greece was accessible with difficulty opened the Marcgraviaceae (mark-grá-vi-á-sé), n. pl. [NL. (Choisy, 1824), < Marcgravia + -aceae]. Originally, a suborder of plants of the Marcgraviaceae; now, a tribe of the Ternstroemiaceae, typified by the genus Marcgravia. It embraces genera of tropical American plants with imbricate or coherent hood-shaped petals, anthers fixed by the base, and numerous stamens. They are climbing or epiphytic, woody plants, with flowers in terminal racemes, frequently interspersed with peculiar shaped bracts.

It. marca, ML. marca), border, bound, frontier, the Rom. forms being from the OHG. cognate with AS. mare; see further under *mark*¹, n.] A frontier or boundary of a territory; a border; hence, a borderland; a district or political division of a country continuous with the boundary line of another country. In Scotland the term is commonly applied to the boundaries, or the marks which determine the boundaries, of continuous estates or lands, whether large or small. The word is most familiar historically with reference to the boundaries between England and Wales and between England and Scotland. The latter were divided into two parts, the western and the middle marches, each of which had courts peculiar to itself, and a kind of president or governor, who was called warden of the marches. Pennington, Locksley Hall.

4. A military signal to move, consisting of a particular drum-beat or bugle-call.

If drummers once sound a lustle marcch indeed, Then far-well books, for he will trudge with speed.

Gawcotte, Fruits of War.

5. In music, a strongly rhythmic composition designed to accompany marching or to imitate a march movement. The rhythm is usually duple, but it may be triply compound. Marches generally consist of two contrasted sections, the second of which is commonly called the trio is softer and more flowing than the first, and is followed by a repetition of the first. Rapid marches are often called quicksteps or military marches. Slow marches are also called procession and marches, and are further distinguished as funeral (or dead), nuptial, triumphal, etc.

6. In warrior, one of the short laths placed across the treads beneath the shafts of a team.

F. H. Knight.

7. In the game of euche, a taking of all five tricks by one side. — Plank march, see plank. Forced march, a march vigorously pressed in certain emergencies in time of war, as to effect a rapid concentration of troops or a strategic combination. It is exhausting to even the best troops and as a rule should not exceed thirty miles a day, special care is supposed to be taken to avoid such exhaustion or just before going into action. The troops are relieved by changing the gait, alternating the double with the quick time, and in the cavalry the horses are relayed for fifteen minutes every hour by the dismounting and marching of the men. Any distance over twenty miles a day is reckoned a forced march. March past, the march of a body of soldiers in front of a reviewing officer or some high dignitary.

Between 1880 and 1890 troops paraded on the ground, and their marcch past was an event of the highest political significance.

Murray, Tales of Hoar, III.

Rogue's march, music played in derision to accompany the expulsion from a regiment of a soldier who is drummed out of an objectionable person ignominiously expelled from a community. — To steal a march. See steal.

It was the first month of the ancient Roman year till the adoption of the Julian calendar, which was followed by the Gregorian; previous to the latter it was reckoned the first month in many European countries, and so continued in England till 1752, the legal year there before that date beginning on the 25th of March. — Mad as a March hare. See hare. — March ale, ale brewed in March. — March beer, beer brewed in the month of March. Spring and autumn were considered the best seasons for brewing; hence, beer for keeping was brewed when possible either in March or in October. — March meeting. See meeting.

It is of a bright yellowish color with long hair about the head making a kind of mane. It inhabits the region of the upper Amazon and was formerly in much request as a pet. Also called silly monkey and lion monkey.

marinado (mä-ri'-nä-dö), n. [Cf. F. marinade, pickle, L. mare, of the sea; see marine and -ade.] 1. A compound liquor, generally of wine and vinegar, with herbs and spices, in which fish or meats are steeped before cooking to improve their flavor. 2. Pickled meat, either flesh or fish. F. Phillips, 1706.

marinade (mä-ri'-nä-dö), n. [Cf. F. marinade, pickle, L. mare, of the sea; see marine and -ade.] Same as marinado.

marinado (mä-ri'-nä-dö), n. [Cf. marinade.] In the West Indies, a little cake made of the edible core of the cabbage-palm.

Those delicious little cakes called marinades, which you hear the colored peddlers calling out for sale. Harpers Mag., LXXVII, 327.

Marine (mä-ri'-nö), n. [NI. (Bentham and Hooker, 1863), form. pl. of L. marinus, marine.] A series of monostyledonous marine plants of the natural order Hydrocharitaceae, characterized by having the cotyledon project beyond the thick radicle. It embraces the genera Enhalus, Thalassia, and Halophila, natives of the Indian and South Pacific oceans. Also called Thalassine.

marinaget, n. [OF. marinage (= Sp. marinero); Cf. marin, marine, + -age.] Seamanship.

And with helps of our oars within the bords, and by other crafts of marinaget, with great difficulty and fere they kepte the Gallye from the shore. Sir R. Hopton, Pylgrimage, p. 68.

marinal (mä-ri'-nä-l), a. [Cf. marine + -al.] Of the sea; saline; bitter. [Rare.]

These here are festival, not marinal waters. Rev. P. Adams, Works, I, 108.

marinate (mä-ri'-nä-tö), v. t.: pret. and pp. marinated, pp. marinating. [Var. of marinade, v., as if marino + -ate.] To salt or pickle, as fish, and then preserve in oil or vinegar.

Why am I styled a cook, if I'm so loath
To marinate my fish, or season broth?
W. King, Art of Cookery.

They set before us . . . a Marinated ragout flavoured with cinnamon. R. F. Burton, in Arabian Nights, I, 254.

marine (mä-ri'-nö), a. and n. [In present pron after mod. F., but found in ME., marino, marino, Cf. OF. and F. marin = Sp. Pg. It. marino, of the sea; fem. as a noun, F. marine = Sp. Pg. It. marina, the sea-shore, sea, shipping interests, etc.; L. marinus, of or belonging to the sea, Cf. mare, the sea, = AS. mere, a lake, = E. mere, see mar.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the sea; characteristic of the sea; existing in or formed by the sea; as, a marine picture or view; the marine fauna and flora; marine deposits left by ancient seas; marine tides. — 2. Relating to or connected with the sea; used or adapted for use at sea, acting or operating at sea; as, a marine chart; a marine language; a marine engine; marin forces. — 3. Relating to navigation or shipping; maritime; nautical; naval.

The code of maritime laws, which are called the laws of Oleron, and are received by all nations in Europe as the ground and substratum of all their marine constitutions, was confessedly compiled by our King Richard the First. Blackstone Com., I, viii.

4. In cool, technically, inhabiting the high seas; oceanic; pelagic; distinguished from maritime or littoral. Fleet marine officer. See def. Marine acid, hydrochloric acid. Marine barometer. See barometer. Marine belt. Same as three mile belt, which, see under mile. Marine boiler, a boiler, partially adapted to use in steamboats and steam ships. Maximum heating surface with a minimum of cubic space occupied by the entire boiler and furnace is a distinctive feature of marine boilers, in which also the best protection of grates to heating surface, arrangement of pipes to secure active water-circulation, strength, durability, and convenience in firing are points to which the greatest attention is paid. Corrugated plates for direct fire-surface and forced draft are prominent characteristics of modern marine boilers of the best type. Marine corps. See corps. Marine cotton. Same as sea-cotton. Marine ducks, the sea-ducks, the subfamily Pelecanidae. — Marine engine, any steam engine adapted for use in sea-going steamers. Marine engineering. See naval engineering, under engineering. Marine gide, governor, guard, hospital. See the nouns. Marine insurance. See insurance. Marine league. See league. Marine railway, a railway extending from the shore into the sea, on which vessels are hauled up to be repaired or are transported from one body of water to another. Marine sauce, Purpureus and sea, a common seaweed. Marine soap, a kind of soap well adapted for washing with sea-water made chiefly of coconut-oil. Marine store, a piece where old staves, materials, as canvas, junk, iron, etc., are bought and sold, applied also to shops where second-hand clothes, as shoes, coats, etc., are bought and sold. In Great Britain the keeper of the store must have his or her name with "Store" in Marine Stores "painted distinctly in letters not less than six inches long, over the door." He must register his purchases, not buy from a person apparently under sixty, and not put up any cable or article exceeding five fathoms in length without an order from a justice of the peace. Marine surveyor, a civil officer who surveys ships for insurance, repairs, etc. Marine well, in zee, a long narrow vessel resembling a sort of well, the head of which is made frictions with projecting teeth, etc. — Syn. Zee-well, Zee-well, etc. See marinade.

II. n. 1. The sea-shore.

I do you to write that they have had strange battles before eyes in the playn afore the Seimere, that all the countrey hadde robbed, and all the myrgne and the peries toward loyves. Marine (E. E. T. S.), II, 220.

Every evening they adorne themselves along the Marine, the men on horse-back, and the women in large Carrozes. Sandys, Travels, p. 102.

2. Shipping in general; the maritime interest as represented by ships; sea-going vessels considered collectively, either in the aggregate or as regards nationality or class; as, the mercantile marine of a country; the naval marine.

Holland is rapidly increasing her steam marine. D. A. Wells, Our Merchant Marine, p. 31.

3. In France, specifically, the naval establishment; the national navy and its adjuncts; as, the minister of marine, or of the marine.

The first [faction] wished France . . . to attend solely to her marine, . . . and thereby to overpower England on her own element. Burke, A Negligent Peace, II.

4. A soldier who serves on board of a man-of-war; one of a body of troops enlisted to do military service on board of ships or at dockyards. In the United States and British services, they are clothed and armed similarly to infantry of the line.

5. An empty bottle. See the quotation.

I have always heard that empty bottles were, especially among army men, called marines. I remember that some sixty years ago a good story used to be told, I think, of the Duke of York. His Royal Highness, at some military convivial meeting, little thinking of giving offence to the susceptibilities of any man present, ordered a servant to "take away those marines." N. and Q., 7th ser., VI, 28.

6. In painting, a sea-piece; a marine view.

On the right hand of one of the marines of Salvador, in the Pitti Palace, there is a passage of sea reaching to the sunrise. Ruskin.

Royal marines, troops who serve on British ships of war. Tell that to the marines, that will do for the marines, expressions signifying disbelief in some statement made or story told. They originated in the fact that, owing to their ignorance of seamanship, the marines were formerly made butts of by the sailors.

marine (mä-ri'-nä), a. [F., Cf. marine, the sea; see marine.] In her, having the lower part of the body like the tail of a fish; said of any beast. Compare sea-don.

marined (mä-ri'-nä-dö), a. Same as marine.

marineer, n. An obsolete or archaic form of mariner. Chaucer, Canterbury.

mariner (mä-ri'-nä-r), n. [Early mod. E. also mariner. Cf. ME. mariner, mariner, mariner, Cf. OF. (F. and P.) marinier (= Sp. marinero = Port. marinheiro = It. marinieri, marinieri), a seaman, Cf. mar, of the sea; see marine.] A seaman or sailor; one who directs or assists in the navigation of a ship. In law the term also includes a servant on a ship.

And (they) hadde goode wynde and softe, and goode marinere men for to guide him thre to the Rock with-out any trouble or amoye. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), III, 370.

Thanne the Mariners sang the letany

Fortunacion, Drake, Eng. Trav., p. 22.

Meantime his busy mariners he hastes

His shattered sails with rigging to restore. Drayton, Annus Mirabilis, st. 65.

It is an ancient mariner.

And he stoppeth one of three.

Chaucer, Ancient Mariner.

Fly of the mariners' compass, the compass-card. — Mariners' compass. See compass. 7. Master mariner, the captain of a merchant vessel or fishing-vessel. Syn. Seaman, etc. See sailor.

marinership (mä-ri'-nä-ship), n. [Cf. mariner + -ship.] Seamanship.

Having none experience in the seale of marinershippe Udall, in Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 6.

The Phœnicia, famous for Marchandise and Marinership, sailed from the Red Sea round about Africk. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 50.

Marinism (mä-ri'-nizm), n. [Cf. Marini (see def.) + -ism.] Extreme mannerism in literature, like that of the school of Italian poets of the seventeenth century, founded by G. B. Marini (1580-1625), which was characterized by extravagance in the use of metaphor, antitheses, and forced conceits.

A hilliard of Bologna followed in Marini's steps. . . . In general, we may say that all the poets of the 17th century were more or less infected with Marinism. Encyc. Brit., XIII, 611.

Marinist (mä-ri'-nist), n. [Cf. Marini; see Marini.] A poet of the school of Marini.

There was for a time a large class of imitators of his (Marini's) style, called Marinists. Amer. Cyc., XI, 167.

marinorama (mä-ri'-nä-rä-mä), n. [*Irreg. Cf. L. marinus, of the sea, + Gr. -orama, a view, Cf. -opsis, see.*] A representation of sea-views; an exhibition of scenes at sea in the manner of a panorama. [Rare.]

Marionette (mä-ri'-nä-tö), n. [Cf. Gr. Maria, Mary, + -ionette, worshiper; see idolater.] One who worships or pays religious devotion to the Virgin Mary; one who practices Marionism.

The method of the Museum was, to offer to their names the sign of the cross, which contains our motto.

vulgar do to this day keep up, by signing a cross for their mark when unable to write their names.

Blackstone, Com., II. 22.

She had grown up with a twin brother, studying from the same books and in the same classes, and getting the same marks, or higher ones.

Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 218.

3. A distinguishing peculiarity; a spot, mole, nevus, special formation, or other singularity; a natural sign; as, a birth-mark; the marks on sea-shells or wild animals. In farriery the mark is a deep median depression on the cutting surface of the incisor tooth of a horse, due to the inflection of a vertical fold of the tooth. It is seen of different characters according to the wear of the tooth, being thus to some extent an index of a horse's age. It disappears after the tooth is worn down beyond the extent of the fold. The dark color is due simply to the accumulation in the fold of food or dirt. See the quotation under mark-tooth.

He that by good use and experience hath in his eye the right mark and very true lustre of the diamond reflecteth and will not look upon the counterfeit, but it ever so well handled, ever so craftily polished.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), Int., p. 20.

For marks described in men's nativity
Are nature's faults, not their own luxury.

Shak., Lucio, I. 535.

4. A significant note, character, sign, token, or indication; a determinative attestation. In logic, to say that a thing has a certain mark is to say that something in particular is true of it. Thus, according to a certain school of metaphysicians, "Incognizability is a mark of the Infinite."

I do spy some marks of love in her.

Shak., Much Ado, II. 3. 235.

Pride and covetousness are the sure marks of those false Prophets which are to come.

Milton, Apology for Aemilius.

I saw his Mistle coming from his Northern Expedition ride in pomp, and a kind of ovation, with all the marks of a happy peace.

Evings, Diary, Oct. 30, 1849.

A mark is that in a thing which constitutes a part of the cognition of it; or, what comes to the same thing, a partial representation, so far as it is considered as a ground of cognition of the whole representation. All our concepts are therefore marks, and all thinking is nothing but representing by marks.

Kant, Logic (trans.), Int., viii.

5. A guiding or indicative sign or token. (a) That which serves as an indication of place or direction; an object that marks or points out. as, a book-mark; boundary marks; to guide a vessel by land-marks on the shore.

The steamer swung into her (to me) utterly invisible marks.

S. L. Clemens, Life on the Mississippi, p. 97.

(b) A badge, banner, or other distinguishing device.

The banners (or marks) of the ancient Danes were in times of peace light colored, but in war those of a blood color, with a black raven on a red ground.

Frederick, Hist. of the Flag, p. 25.

6. An object aimed at; a point of assault or attack; especially, something set up or marked out to be shot at; often used figuratively; as, to hit or miss the mark; a mark for destruction.

By fifty paces, our kynge sayd,

The merke was to longe.

Lytell, Gen. of Robyn Hode (Chivalry Ballads, V. 173).

I will shoot three arrows at the side thereof, as though I shot the mark.

1 Sam. ix. 20.

No slander's mark was ever yet the fair

Shak., Sonnets, lxx.

Death loves a shining mark, a signal blow

Young, Night Thoughts, v. 1011.

7. An object of endeavor; a point or purpose striven for; that which one aims to reach or attain.

I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Phil. III. 14.

Make therefore to yourself some mark, and go towards it allegrely.

Donne, Letters, xx.

Behold it well,

For four divine Philosophy

Should push beyond her mark.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, liti.

8. An attainable point or limit; capacity for reaching; reach; range. [Rare.]

You are abused

Beyond the mark of thought.

Shak., A. and C., III. 4. 3.

9. An object of note or observation; hence, a pattern or example. [Rare.]

He was the mark and glass, copy and book

That fashion'd others.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. 3. 31.

10. Right to notice or observation; claim or title to distinction; importance; eminence; as, a man of mark.

And left me in reputeless banishment,

A fellow of no mark nor likelihood.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., III. 2. 45.

Soldiers of royal mark scorn such base purchase.

Fletcher and another, False One, iv. 2.

For performance of great mark it needs extraordinary health.

Emerson, Conduct of Life.

11. A marking or noting; note; attention; observance. [Rare.]

Not first, of shippe-craft can I right night,
Of their making have I no marks.

York Plays, p. 42.

He hath devoted . . . himself to the contemplation, mark; and denotement of her parts and graces.

Shak., Othello, II. 3. 322.

12. A license of reprisals. See marque.—13. A boundary; a bound or limit noted or established; hence, a set standard, or a limit to be reached; as, to speak within the mark; to be up to the mark.

In that Contree of Libya is the Sea more hygh than the Land, and it someths that it wolde covere the Earthe, and natholes sit it passeth not his Markes.

Mansuetude, Travels, p. 144.

Choose discreetly,
And Virtue guide you! There all the world, in one man, Stands at the mark.

Fletcher, Mad Lover, v. 4.

It's only a question between the larger sum and the smaller. I shall be within the mark any way.

Dickens, Black House, xixvii.

The ancient capital of Burgundy is wanting in character; it is not up to the mark.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 232.

14. In the middle ages, in England and Germany, a tract of land belonging in common to a community of freemen, who divided the cultivated portion or arable mark among their individual members, used the common or ordinary mark together for pasturage or other general purposes, and dwelt in the village mark or central portion, or apart on their holdings. It was a customary tenure, like that of the existing Russian mir, and was similarly managed and governed.

The Mark system, as it was called, according to which the body of kindred freemen, scattered over a considerable area and cultivating their lands in common, used a domestic constitution based entirely or primarily on the community of tenure and cultivation.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 19.

15†. Image; likeness.

Which mankynde is so fair part of thy work
That thou it madest lyk to thy own mark

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, I. 152.

Hence—16†. The mass of beings having a common likeness; posterity.

If women hadde written stories,
As dookes han withynne hire oratories,
They wolde han written of men more wikkednesse
Than all the mark of Adam may redece.

Chaucer, Prologue to Wife of Bath's Tale, I. 600.

Accidental synthetical mark, a mark not predicated of the subject in the definition of it.—Adequate mark.

Same as adequate definition (which see, under definition).

—Analytical mark. Same as essential mark.—Arable mark. See def. 14.—Beside the mark. See bende.

—Bird mark, a well known mark of certain pieces of pottery, including Liverpool wares and supposed to be the crest belonging to the arms of the city of Liverpool. —Cadence-mark, in music, a vertical stroke in a text arranged for chanting, to indicate how the words are to be fitted to the measures of the cadence.—Common mark. See def. 14.—Constitutive mark, in logic, See constitutive.

Coordinate marks, in logic, independent predicates of the same subject.—Demerit mark. See demerit.

—Diacritical mark. See diacritical.—Essential mark, in logic, one of the characters predicated in the definition of anything. Also called analytical mark.—Fruitful mark, in logic, See fruitful.—God bless or God save the mark! Save the mark! etc., ejaculatory or parenthetical phrase expressive of irony, scorn, depreciation, surprise, or a humorous sense of the extraordinary. "In archery, when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out 'God bless the mark!'" that is, prevent any one coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. "Ironically it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere." Breker, Diet. Phrase and Fable, p. 750.

For he made me mad

To see him shine so brisk and smell so sweet,

And talk so like a waiting gentlewoman

Of guns and drums and wounds—God save the mark!

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., I. 3. 54.

To be ruled by my conscience, I should stay with the Jew my master, who, God bless the mark, is a kind of devil.

Shak., M. of V., II. 2. 25.

My father had no more nose, my dear, saving the mark! than there is upon the back of my hand.

Steele.

"Deny myself" meant simply pleasure you

The sacred and superior, save the mark!

Browning, Ring and Book, II. 274.

God's mark. See God.—Hall mark.—High-water mark. See water.—Leading marks. See leading.—Lenticular mark. See lenticular.—Low-water mark. See water.

Pg. margat, marl. Perhaps a Celtic word: cf. Bret. marg, marl; but the W. marl, Ir. Gael. marla, marl, must be of E. origin.*] A mixture of clay with carbonate of lime, the latter being present in considerable quantity, forming a mass which is not consolidated, but falls to pieces readily on exposure to the air. The word marl, however, is used so vaguely as to be often ambiguous, and in England some substances are thus designated in which there is no lime. Marl is a valuable fertilizing material for different kinds of soil, according to its composition. In New Jersey the mixtures of greensand with clay much used as fertilizers are commonly called marls, or greensand marls, and many varieties thus designated contain no more than one or two per cent. of carbonate of lime. Marls and marly soils are especially well developed in the Permian and Triassic of England and on the continent. The upper division of the Keuper in England is known as the "Red Marl Series," and in places reaches a thickness of 2,000 feet. These marls are largely quarried at various points for making bricks. See quarry-marl.

marquis, marquess (már'kwis, -kwes, orig. már'kis, -hes), n. [Also dial. markis (the proper historical form); formerly also marquesse (and, in ref. to Italian use, marchem); < MF. markus, < OF. markus, marquis, F. marquis = Pr. marquez, marquis = Sp. marqués = Pg. marquês = It. marchese, < ML. marchisus, a prefect of a frontier town, later as a title of nobility, < marca, marea, a frontier, march; see march.] In Great Britain and France, and in other countries where corresponding titles exist, a nobleman whose rank is intermediate between that of an earl or count and that of a duke. A marquis was originally an officer charged with the government of a march or frontier territory; the title as an honorary dignity was first bestowed in England in 1385. Dukes have commonly the secondary title of marquis, which is used as the courtesy-title of their eldest sons. The wife of a marquis is styled marquessina. The coronet of an English marquis consists of a richly chased circle of gold, with four strawberry leaves alternating with four balls or large pearls set on short points on its edge; the cap is of ermine velvet, with a gold tassel on the top, and turned up with ermine. See cut under coronet.

Marriage (már'ij), n. [< MF. mariage, < OF. (and F.) mariage = Pr. maridage, maridage = Sp. maridaje = It. maritaggio, ML. maritatum, marriage, < maritus, a husband, marita, a wife; see marital, marry.] 1. The legal union of a man with a woman for life; the state or condition of being married; the legal relation of spouses to each other; wedlock. In this sense marriage is a status or condition which, though originating in a contract, is not capable of being terminated by the parties' rescission of the contract, because the interests of the state and of children require the affirming of certain permanent duties and obligations upon the parties.

2. The formal declaration or contract by which act a man and a woman join in wedlock. In this sense marriage is a civil contract, implying the free and intelligent mutual consent of competent persons to take each other as a present act, as husband and wife, and according to the modern and most prevalent view no formalities other than such as the law of the jurisdiction may expressly impose are necessary to prevent either from subsequently repudiating the other or denying the legitimacy of their issue. The formalities provided for by the law of some of the United States are optional, being intended chiefly to enable the parties to produce authentic evidence of the contract. When a man and a woman live and cohabit together, and conduct themselves as man and wife in the society and neighbor-hood of which they are members, till the belief and reputation that they are married become general, their marriage is presumed, without other evidence, for purposes of enforcing rights and liabilities of third persons.

O Hamlet, what a falling off was there!
From me, whose love was of that dignity
That it went hand in hand even with the vow
I made to her in marriage! Shak., Hamlet, I, 3.

Marriage, Wedding, Nuptials, Matrimony, Wedlock.* Marriage is the act of forming or entering into the union of the union itself. Wedding generally includes the ceremonies and festivities attending the celebration of the union or marriage, but not essential to it. Marriages are often made without such ceremonies. Nuptials is more formal than wedding; we speak of the nuptials of a prince. Matrimony is the married state, or the state into which a couple are brought by marriage. Wedlock is the vernacular English word for matrimony, not differing from it in mean-ing, but being the ordinary term in law, as, born in wed-lock.*

A soft tissue found in the interior of bones, both in the cylindrical hollow of the long bones and in the hollows of cancellated bone structure; the medulla or medullary matter of bone. It varies greatly in different situa-tions; in the marrow of the shafts of adult bones, as the humerus and femur, is a soft yellow solid consist-ing of about 10 per cent of fat. The red marrow of various bones, vertebral canal, vertebra, and costal, is softer, and contains very few fat cells, but numerous marrow cells and other resembling the uncolored red corpuscles of the marrow. The so-called spinal marrow, or medulla spi-nalis, is the spinal cord and the central axis of the nervous system, a tissue of an entirely different character, not found in the hollow of a bone, but in the cavity running through the canal of vertebrae.*

marrow (mar'ow), n. [ME. marrow, marrow; origin obscure. Cf. maral, which is perhaps a corruption of marrow.] A companion or mate; an associate; an intimate friend; a fellow; hence, one of a pair of either persons or things; a match; as, your knife is the very marrow of mine. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Birds of a feather best fly together,

Then like partners about your mark I go.

Marrows adieu. God send you fater wather.

Promus and Conradius, l. 11. 4. (Nares.)

If I see all y^e are due to me

An that can marrow me

The Downy Den of Yarrow (Child's Ballads, III. 67)

But ye, but ye, my bonnie, bonnie bride!

But ye, but ye, my winsome marrow!

W. Hamilton, House of Yarrow.

marrow (mar'ow), v. t. [marrow], v. t. To associate with; hence, to match; fit. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.] marrow, n. [ME. marrow, marrow; AS. mæra (mæra, mæra, mæra, mæra) = OHG. mæra, mæra, MIHG. mar (mar) (also, with variation, MD. marra, marra, D. marre = OHG. mæra, mæra, MIHG. mæra, mar, G. mære), soft. Cf. mellow.] Soft; tender.

marrow-bone (mar'ow-bon), n. [Formerly also and still dial. marry-bone.] [ME. marrow-bon, marry-bon; marrow + bone.] The conjuncture that marrow-bones, in the second sense, is a "corruption of Mary bones, in allusion to the reverence paid to the Virgin Mary by kneeling," is absurd. "The use is doubtless a mere whimsical application of the word." 1. A bone containing fat or edible marrow. See marrow, 1.

A cook that hadde with hem for the nonis,

To brylle chykyn a with the marry-bone

And poude marchant bot, and galyngale.

Chaucer, Gen. Procl. to C. T., l. 380.

2. Pl. The bones of the knees; the knees. [Humorous.]

Down he fel upon his maribones, & piteously prayd me to forgyve him y^e one by. Mr. P. More, Works, p. 737.

Or quickly

On your marrow bones, and thank this lady!

Beau. and FL., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 3.

3. A large bone used to make a rhythmical noise by striking against something.

Even the middle class were glad to get rid of the noise of drums, etc. (which still survives in the marrow bones and cloggers—the rough music of a lower class wedding).

J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, l. 36.

To ride in the marrow bone coach, to go on foot. [Slang.]

marrow-cells (mar'ow-sells), n. pl. Cells resembling white blood-corpuscles, but larger, with clearer protoplasm and relatively larger nucleus.

marrowfat (mar'ow-fat), n. A kind of tall-growing, wrinkled pea.

marrowish (mar'ow-ish), a. [marrow + -ish.] Of the nature of or resembling marrow.

In the upper region serving the animal faculties, the chief organ is the brain, which is a soft marrowish, and white substance.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 19.

marrowless (mar'ow-less), a. [marrow + -less.] Without marrow; not medullary.

Thy bones are marrowless, thy blood is cold.

Shak., Macbeth, III. 4. 94.

marrowless (mar'ow-less), a. [marrow + -less.] 1. Without a match; unequalled.—2.

Not matching, as two things of the same kind, but not the same color, fit, etc. [Scotch.]

marrow-putting (mar'ow-put'ing), n. A pudding prepared from or with beef-marrow or the variety of gourd known in England as vegetable marrow.

marrow-spoon (mar'ow-spoon), n. A long narrow spoon for scooping out marrow from bones.

marrow-squash (mar'ow-skwash), n. Vegetable marrow. See squash. [U. S.] marrowy (mar'ow-y), a. [marrow + -y.] Full of marrow; strong; energetic; hence, in discourse or writing, pithy, forcible, effective, etc. A rich marrowy vein of internal sentiment.

Haditt.

Marrubium (mar'ow-ee-um), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham, 1848), Marrubium + -um.] A subtribe of Labiate plants, included in the tribe Stachydeae. It is characterized by a tubular or bell-shaped calyx, with rather prominent ribs and a corolla tube which is included or slightly exerted. It embraces a variety of which Marrubium is the type, and about 20 species.

Marrubium (mar'ow-ee-um), n. [NL. (L. marrubium, hoarhound.] A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Labiales, and the tribe Stachydeae, type of the subtribe Marrubieae. It is characterized by an included corolla tube, with the lower lip nearly flat or concave and by having the nutlets rounded at the apex and the outer cell at length confluent. They are perennial herbs, often tomentose or woolly, with wrinkled leaves, and small usually white or purple flowers in dense axillary cymes. About 35 species have been described from Europe, North Africa and extratropical Asia. The species M. vulgare, the common or white hoarhound, is very widely distributed (perhaps indigenous to America) and is sometimes used medicinally. See hoarhound.

marum (mar'um), n. Same as marrow.

marry (mar'ee), v. t. [part and pp. marry, marrying.] [ME. marryen, marryen, COE. (and F.) marry = Pr. Sp. maridar = It. maritare, L. maritare, wed, marry, maritus, a husband, marita, a wife, as an adj., maritus, pertaining to marriage, conjugial, orig. appar. only as fem. adj., marita, provided with a husband (cf. vidua, deprived of one's wife, vidua, deprived of one's husband orig. only fem., a widow; see vidua), as if fem. pp. of a verb marire, provide with a husband, maris maris, a man, husband; see marital, matril.] 1. trans. 1. To unite in wedlock or matrimony; join for life, as a man and a woman, or a man or woman to one of the opposite sex; constitute man and wife, or a husband or wife, according to the laws or customs of a nation.

When I and I would die a bachelor, I did not think I should live till I was married.

Shak., Much Ado, II. 3. 105.

Tell him that he shall marry the couple himself.

Gay, The What d'ye call it.

2. To give a marriage; cause to be married. He would have married me full highly, to a great Princess daughter of I would have foretaken my law, and I have been. Manderley, Travels, p. 105. Yet would the marry with the thickude put of my back To the noblest bachelor that thyn herte wot to do.

Robt. of Gloucester, l. 10.

An Example of one of the Kings of France, who would not marry his son without the advice of his Parliament.

Hood, Letters, l. 11. 3.

3. To take for husband or wife; as, a man marries a woman, or a woman marries a man.

Fear. You come hither, my lord, to marry this lady? Claudio. No.

Leonato. Is he married to her? Fear. You come to marry her.

Shak., Much Ado, IV. 1. 4.

4. Figuratively, to unite intimately or by some close bond of connection.

Then, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am married unto you.

For Bl. 14.

Marrying his sweet nooses with their silver sound

W. Greene, Britannia's Pastors, l. 3.

5. trans. to fasten together, as two ropes, end to end, in such a way that in unweaving one from a block the other is drawn in.

To marry is to join ropes together for the purpose of reeling, by placing their ends together and connecting them by a winding.

Foster, Naval Dict.

syn. 3. To wed, espouse.

II. intrans. To enter into the conjugal state; take a husband or a wife.

I will therefore that the younger women marry.

1 Tim. v. 14.

I will marry one day.

Shak., C. of E., II. 1. 42.

Ya, sir, and wot ye so?
Married! there I pray you marry.

Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 11.

Cal. Will thou be pleased to harken once again to the suit I made to thee?

Mr. Marry, will I; kneel and repeat it.

Shak., Tempest, II. 2. 28.

(The word was formerly much used, with various additions, to express surprise, contempt, or satirical encouragement, as in the phrases following.)—Married come up! come! Married come out! indeed!

Give my son time, Mr. Jolly? Married come up.

Charles, Currier of Coleman Street (1863). (Nares.)

Marsipposomus (mār-sī-pō-sō-mŭs), n. pl. [NL. A. P. de Candolle, 1830], < Marsippos + -soma.] An order of leptosporangiate heterosporous fern-like plants, in which the fructification consists of sporocarps either borne on peduncles which rise from the rootstock near the leaf-stalk or consolidated with it, and contains both macrospores and microspores.

Marsipposomata (mār-sī-pō-sō-mā-ta), n. pl. [NL. (Baker, 1857), < Marsippos + -soma.] With some systematists, a suborder of plants of the order Rhizocarpaceae, or heterosporous Filicinae: virtually the same as the order Marsipposomata.

Marsipposomata. A naval gun-carriage, in use with smooth-bore guns, having no front trucks, the front transom resting directly on the deck of the ship.

Marsipposomata (mār-sī-pō-brang-kī-ā), a. and n. [See Marsipposomata.] I. a. Having pursed gills; pertaining to the Marsipposomata, or having their characters.

II. a. A vertebrate of the class Marsipposomata; a myxont or myxine fish.

Marsipposomata (mār-sī-pō-brang-kī-ā-tā), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Marsipposomata.

Marsipposomata (mār-sī-pō-brang-kī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. marsippos or marsippos, a pouch, bag (see marsippos), + ippos, a horse, gill.] A group of vertebrates, variously denominated by naturalists. In all systems of classification it consists of those vertebrates to which have the skull imperfectly developed, the notochord not confined beyond the pituitary body, the brain distinctly differentiated, the heart well developed, with an auricle and a ventricle, the gills forming fixed sacs within branchial apertures on each side, six or more in number, the lower jaw defective, and the mouth round like a sucker, whence the alternative name Cyclostomata. In the earlier systems the Marsipposomata were regarded as an order or a subclass of fishes, they are now designated as a class of Vertebrata, and divided into two primary groups, Hyperostei and Hyperostei, the former comprising the lampreys, the latter the hags. Both are known as myxontes. Marsipposomata is a synonym of Cyclostomata. 2. See cut under lamprey.

Marsipposomata (mār-sī-pō-sō-mā-ta), a. and n. [NL. Marsipposomata, < L. marssipposomata, a pouch: see marssipposomata.] I. a. Having the character of a bag, pouch, or marsupium; marsupiate. — 2. Of or pertaining to a marsupium: as, marsupial bones. — 3. Provided with a marsupium; specifically, pertaining to the Marsipposomata, or having their characters.

Marsupial bones, epipubic bones, sclerochordal ossifications developed in the abdomen of the abdomen of placental mammals, and articulated with the pelvic bones, supposed by some to be related to the support of the pouch, and known to have an office in relation to the muscle which acts upon the mammary glands — Marsupial capsule. See marsupial.

II. a. A member of the order Marsipposomata; any implacental marsupial mammal. Also called marsupiate. — b. Pertaining to Marsipposomata. See herbivorous Marsipposomata.

Marsupialia (mār-sī-pō-sō-pi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of Marsupialis: see Marsupialis.] An order of the class Mammalia, coextensive with the subclass Didelphia, containing implacental mammals usually provided with a marsupium or pouch for the reception and nourishment of the young; the marsupials or pouched animals. There being no developed placenta, the period of gestation is very brief, and the young are born extremely small, imperfect, and quite helpless. In this state they are immediately transferred to the pouch on the belly of the mother, where are the teats, to which the little creatures adhere firmly for a while, completing their development by sucking milk. As they grow larger and stronger, they are able to let go and take hold of the teat again, and even after leaving the pouch they may for a while retreat to it, or be carried about elsewhere on the mother's body. (See cut under marsupial.) The uterus is double, and the vagina also is more or less completely divided into two separate passages (whence the name Didelphia), the servum of the male is abdominal in position, and pendulous in front of the penis. The corpus callosum is rudimentary but the cerebral hemispheres are connected by a well developed anterior commissure. The angle of the mandible is normally inflected. There is a wide range of adaptive modification in the structural details of the marsupials, the order in itself including representatives or analogues of nearly all the other orders of mammals, as the carnivorous, the insectivorous, the herbivorous, etc. At the present time the marsupials are eminently characteristic of the Australian region, only the Didelphidae or opossums being found in America, but in former epochs the distribution of the marsupials was general, and some of the oldest known mammalian fossils of Mesozoic age are supposed to belong to this order. It has been variously subdivided. Owen in 1829 divided it into five tribes, Sarcophaga, Eutrochophaga, Coryphaga, Phascogaster, and Didelphidae. A main division, based on the dentition, is into Inopodonta and Polypodonta. In 1877 Gill made the four suborders Rhizophaga, Synactis, Dasyproctina, and Didelphina, with nine families, Phascogasteridae, Marsupialidae, Tarsipodidae, Phalangeridae, Phascogasteridae, Peromyscidae, Dasyproctidae, Myrmecodontidae, and Didelphidae, for the living forms, and four fossil families, Inopodontidae, Phalangeridae, Phalangeridae, and Peromyscidae. Also called Marsupialia.

Masora, Massorah (mas'-o-ri), n. [Heb., tradition.] 1. The tradition by which Jewish scholars endeavored to fix the correct text of the Old Testament, so as to preserve it from all corruption. — 2. After the ninth century, the book, or the marginal notes to the Hebrew text, in which the results of such tradition are preserved, embodying the labor of several centuries. There is a twofold Masora, a Babylonian and Eastern, and a Palestinian and Western, the former being the more important. The Masora not only takes account of various readings, but also contains notes of a grammatical and lexicographical character, including the system of Hebrew vowel points first established by it. With much that is valuable, it contains all the material from which a critical revision of the Old Testament text can now be derived. Also written Massorah and Massora.

A more accurate and lasting masoreth than either the synagogue of Ezra or the Galilean school at Tiberias hath left us. Milton, Divines, To the Parliament.

Masorete, n. Same as Massorete.

massoretic, massoretic (mas'-o-ri-tik), a. [Massorete + -ic.] Relating or belonging to the Masora, or to the compilers of the Masora; pertaining to the method or system of the Masora; as, massoretic points — that is, the vowel points furnished by the Masora.

The text which the Revisers used was the so-called massoretic or traditional text. Hebraica Sacra, XLIII. 336 massoretical, massoretic (mas'-o-ri-tik), a. [Massorete + -al.] Same as massoretic.

Masorite, Massorite (mas'-o-ri), n. [Massora + -ite.] One who made the Jewish traditional interpretation of the Bible his special study; specifically, one of that body of Jewish scholars which first put the Masora into written form. See Masora. Also Masorite, Masoret, Massorete, Massoret.

The Massorites extended their care to the vowels. Mather, Vindication of the Bible, p. 261. (Latham) masquerade (mas'-ke-rad'), n. [Fr. D. G. Dan. masquerade = Sw. maskerad, Fr. masquerade = It. mascherata, Sp. Pg. mascarada, a masquerade, cf. mascarata, a mask; see mask.] 1. An assembly of persons wearing masks and usually other disguises, or rich and fantastic dress, usually, a dancing-party or ball. See mask ball.

The world's masquerade: the maskers, you, you, you. Goldsmith, Epil. to Mrs. Lennox's Comedy, Sisters. Warton says that certain theatrical amusements were called masquerades very anciently in France. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 31.

2. Disguise effected by wearing a mask or strange apparel; hence, concealment or apparent change of identity by any means; disguise in general.

And, after all, what is a lie? 'Tis but the truth in masquerade.

Byron, Don Juan, vi. 37
Old Adam will smile at the pains that have made Four winter look fine in such strange masquerade.
Wortworth, Farmer of Upland Vale.

3. The costume of a person who joins in a masquerade; disguising costume of any sort. — 4. A Spanish diversion on horseback. See the quotation.

The masquerade is an exercise they learned from the Moors, performed by squadrons of horse, seeming to charge each other with great fierceness, with bucklers in their left hands and a kind of cone in their right. Clarendon, Life, I. 228.

5. A changeable or shot silk. Fairholt masquerade (mas'-ke-rad'), v. pret. and pp. masqueraded, ppr. masquerading. [Fr. masquerade, n.] 1. To wear a mask, take part in a masquerade. — 2. To disguise one's self.

A freak took an aim in the head, and he goes into the woods, masquerading up and down in a lion's skin.

Mr. R. L. Entrance, Fat. v.
II. trans. To cover with a mask or disguise. His next shift therefore is to masquerade vice and to make it wear the habit and shape of that virtue it most resembles. Killingbeck, sermons, p. 236. (Latham) masquerader (mas'-ke-rad'-er), n. 1. A person disguised and disguised for a masquerade. Hence — 2. A person or thing disguised in any manner.

The dreadful masquerader, thus equipped, mass (mäs), n. [Fr. ME. masse, masser, cf. AN. masse, the mass, a church festival, = ON. mass, = OFries. massa = MD. massa, D. mas = MLat. mäs = OHG. massa, massa, MHG. mass, maser, cf. mäs = Iscl. massa = Sw. massa = Dan. masse = F. messe = Sp. masa = Pg. massa = It. massa, the mass, cf. LIt. massa, dismissal, esp. the dismissal of a congregation, the mass, cf. L. mittere, pp. missus, send; see mission. The name massa is usually said to be taken from the words de, massa est, 'go, it is the dismissal,' or 'go, dismissed' (the word congregatio, 'congregation,' being unnecessarily supposed to be omitted), thought to have been used at that point of the mass when the catechumens were dismissed, and the communion service followed; but it appears to have referred orig. to the dismissal of the congregation at the end of the mass, and to have been applied, by an easy transfer, to the service itself.] 1. The celebration of the Lord's Supper or eucharist.
Out called on adventures.

That Office which was called the Mass by the medieval and the Latin Church, but which we now call the Lord's Supper and the Holy Communion. Prayer, Hist. Book of Common Prayer, p. 306.

The supper of the Lord, and the Holy Communion commonly called the Mass. Book of Common Prayer (1549).

2. The office for the celebration of the eucharist; the liturgy. The component parts of the mass or liturgy are: the ordinary of the mass (ordo missae) and the canon of the mass (canon missae), succeeded by the communion (communion counted part of the canon) and post-communion. An entirely and technically part preceded by the offertory is the mass of the eucharist (missa eucharistica), the remainder the mass of liturgy (missa liturgica). In the Roman Catholic Church different classes of masses are distinguished, as, private mass, votive mass, etc. See the phrases below.

It needeth not to speak of the mass in the service that hadst that day, for it was but form of type. Merton, C. I. P. 8, n. 375

And when our parish mass was done,
Our king, as was his wont to do,
Saw Caesar of hill's Halliads, III. 175

The time of the communion shall be immediately after that the Priest himself hath received the Sacrament, with out the varying of any other rite or ceremony in the Mass. Order of the Communion (1662)

The maiden barbed, not as one unknown,
Nor meanly, but with gorgeous obscenity,
And mass, and rolling mass, like a queen
Thomson, Lancelot and Elaine

3. The sacrament of the eucharist or holy communion. The word mass in this and the preceding senses is peculiarly used of the eucharist, as celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church, or of the foregoing of that Church with regard to the sacrament, as involving not only the doctrine of the real presence and the eucharistic sacrifice, held in some other churches also, but the doctrine of transubstantiation as defined by the Council of Trent. The use of the word mass in the Western Church is as old as the fourth century. The Greek Church has no form precisely corresponding to mass; the sacrament being generally called the eucharist or holy communion, and the office the liturgy. At the Reformation the first Prayer Book (1549) of the Church of England retained the name mass, which was omitted in the second book (1552) and fell into disuse, being popularly regarded as involving a Roman Catholic view of the sacrament. The use of the word has, however, been revived to some extent among Anglicans in the present century. Swedish and Danish Protestants use the corresponding word for their own communion office.

4. A musical setting of certain parts of the Roman Catholic liturgy, also of corresponding parts of the Anglican liturgy. It consists usually of the following sections, each of which is sometimes divided into separate movements: Kyrie, Gloria, including the Stratus agnus Dei, Quoniam, Cum san to Spiritu, Credo, including the Et incarnatus, Cru cifixus, Et Resurrexerit, Sanctus including the Hosanna, Benedictus (including a repetition of the Hosanna), and the Agnus Dei (including the Dona nobis. To these an Offertorium (after the Gloria and before the Sanctus) is sometimes added. The Requiem Mass differs largely from the regular mass, and includes settings of several of the stanzas of the hymn "Dies Irae." The artistic form of musical masses varies widely from unaccompanied plain song to the most elaborate polyphony with orchestral accompaniments. Medieval masses were named usually from the melody which was taken as the subject for contrapuntal treatment, as Mass in G, Mass in A, etc. Modern masses are named from the key of the first movement, as Mass in B-flat.

5. A church festival or feast-day; now only in composition; as, Candlemas, Childermas, Christmas, Lammes, Martinmas, Marymas, Michaelmas, Rogation (or quint), Kermis. By the mass, an oath formerly in common use, sometimes abbreviated to mass.

Mr. Fox. Trust me, I have been most pitifully massed. Mr. Fox. See you, the mass, that I did not, he beat the most sapiently, methinks! Shak., M. W. of W. iv. 2. 214

Mass, see be comes. Widdowson, The Yellow, III. 8

Capitular mass, in Catholic churches, high mass, celebrated on Sundays or festivals. Consecration of the mass. See consecration. Conventual mass, a solemn mass celebrated daily in cathedral and collegiate churches in memory of and for the benefit of their founders. Dry mass, dry service, a form of service, not properly a mass, consisting of part of the eucharistic rite, but without consecration, such as the nuptial or nuptial mass, or the mass of the prebend. The same name was also given to an office consisting of part of the ordinary of the mass, and without other consecration, vocation, or communion; said in some places in the middle ages for strangers who came too late for the celebration. The typical of the Greek Church has been compared to such an office. What is commonly known as the Antiphona Service has sometimes been called by Anglican writers the Dry Service (Massa seca). — High mass, a mass accompanied by music and incense, celebrated on Sundays, feast-days, and other special occasions by a priest or priest, attended by a deacon and subdeacon. — Low mass, the ordinary mass, said, not sung, by the priest. — Mass ball. See ball. — Mass for the dead, a mass celebrated for a person or persons after their death; in the Roman Catholic Church, one celebrated for the purpose of hastening the release of a soul or souls from purgatory. The color of the vestments, etc., is black. — Mass of the Holy Ghost, solemn mass for the Pope, the sovereign, or the state, and held in union with the church or with a religious order. It is celebrated previously to a council or to the election of a bishop or abbot, and also at consecrations and coronations, or to obtain from God some special light or favor. — Mass of the Presanctified. Same as Liturgy of the Presanctified. See liturgy. — Ordinary of the mass. See ordinary. — Private mass. (a) Low mass. (b) Any mass where only the priest communicates, especially such a mass celebrated in a private oratory. Votive mass, a mass which does not correspond with the office of the day, but is said at the choice of the priest.

mass (mäs), v. [Fr. masser, cf. masser, n.] To celebrate mass.

As for the rumours that have or do go abroad, either of our relating or massing, we trust that they which know too well their duty towards their brethren in Christ will not be too light of credence.

Ep. Kellier, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1858), II. 88.

Massing priest, a priest of the Roman Catholic Church.

Christ's doctrine is, that he is "the way" — but this doctrine maketh the massing great the way.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1858), II. 103.

mass (mäs), n. [Fr. masse, cf. OF. masser, F. masse = Fr. massa = Sp. masa = Pg. It. massa = OHG. massa, MHG. G. masse = Dan. masse = Sw. massa, *cf. Hence ult. masculine.] 1. A body of coherent matter; a lump, particularly a large or unformed lump; as, a mass of iron or lead; a mass of flesh; a mass of rock.

Right in the midst the Goddess self did stand

All others, once were but a shapless Mass.

Cavendish, Tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

2. An assemblage or collection of incoherent particles or things; an agglomeration; a congeries; hence, amount or number in general; as, a mass of sand; a mass of foliage, of troops, etc.

I remember a mass of things, but nothing distinctly. Shak., Othello, II. 3. 30.

In our study of anatomy there is a mass of mysterious philosophy. Mr. T. Brown, Religio Medici, I. 30.

3. The bulk or greater part of anything; the chief portion; the main body.

The great mass of the articles on which impost is paid is foreign luxuries. Jefferson, Works, VIII. 68.

The great mass of human calamities, in all ages, has been the result of bad government. Storcy, Misc. Writings, p. 618.

4. Bulk in general; magnitude; massiveness. Witness this army of such mass and charge. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 4. 47.

5. The quantity of any portion of matter as expressed in pounds or grams, and measured on an ordinary balance with the proper reduction for the buoyancy of the atmosphere; otherwise, the relative inertia, or power in reaction, of a body. For example, if two bodies at rest, but free to move, as a gun suspended in vacuo and a bullet in it, are suddenly separated by a force acting between them, their respective velocities will be inversely as their masses, and this phenomenon best defines mass. It is usually confounded with weight, which is more properly the force with which a body is accelerated in the direction in which a plummet points, in consequence of the earth's attraction and rotation. Thus, if a piece of lead which is found to weigh a pound at the base of the Washington monument is transported to the top, it will be found to weigh a pound there, for its mass is unchanged. But if only the piece of lead and the balance are carried to the top of the monument, while the weight against which it has been weighed is left at the base and there attached to the balance at the top by means of a long string or wire (the weight of which is to be properly allowed for), the piece of lead would be found to have lost the weight of one third of a grain, the weight thus varying though the mass does not.

The destructive effects of a cannon-ball are due entirely to its mass and to the relative speed with which it impinges on the target, and would be exactly the same for the same relative speed) in regions so far from the earth or other attracting body that the ball had practically no weight at all. . . . When we open a large gun properly binged, it is the mass with which we have to deal; if it were lying on the ground and we tried to lift it, we should have to deal mainly with its weight.

Full, Properties of Matter.

The discernment of characters is the master key of human policy.
Godolphin, Channing

masterless (mās'tēr-less), a. [ME. masterles; < master + less.] 1. Not having a master; uncontrolled or unprotected by a master. In England, in early times, a masterless man—that is, one who could not prove either that he was a freeman or that he was under the control of a master—was beyond the pale of the law, and could legally be treated as a vagabond, or consigned to a master, or even put to death. Negroes were subject to similar conditions in the southern United States during the existence of slavery.

A masterless man. . . He had better not to speak to me, unless he be in love with gold and galloways.
Kingsley, Westward Ho, vii

In English society of a far later time we find "masterless men" to be a name of this vagabond and peace-breaker.
P. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 30

2. Free from mastery or ownership; liberated from or not subject to a master; having untrammelled liberty.

These shoddy executed and horse come masterless, their reins trailing, their feet, what of the saddle were all likely of knights that their reins hold be day.
Mortimer, E. J. 8, ii 211

Mr. So-and-so, what news do you hear? though indeed it is no matter, for I think one hears nothing else but scandal.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 1

15. Something indefinite as to amount or quantity; a measure, distance, time, or the like, approximately or vaguely stated.

One of his phrases was about forty tons of cedar, built at Barbadoes, and brought to Virginia by Capt. Powell, who there dying, she was sold for a small matter.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 29

As it grows to the market town, a matter of seven miles off.

Sir R. L. Estlin.

The Dutch, as I have before observed, do often buy French bottoms for a small matter of the Maylavans.

Tennyson, Voyages, II. 1, 111.

I have thought to turn a small matter in town to learn somewhat of your matter, as to the way of the sea.

Chambers, Way of the World, III. 15

16. In law: (a) Statement or allegation; as, the court may strike out scandalous matters from a pleading. (b) A proceeding of a special nature, commenced by motion on petition or order to show cause, etc., as distinguished from a formal action by one party against another, commenced by process and seeking judgment; as, the matter of the appointment of A. B. for the appointment of a trustee. — 17. Wood: the appointment with reference to the hard stem of the vine.

Helps hem uppe with canes and litle stakes,

And yokes hem strong yeres after three.

At yeres IIII uppe IIII matters takes

On hew, alle pink yf that the landes be.

Pullerton, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 72.

Abstraction from singular but not from matter. See abstraction. — All is a matter; it is all one thing substantially; hence, it is wholly indifferent.

Whether we make the common readers to laugh or to lower, all is a matter. Patterson, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 134.

A matter of course. See course. — A matter of life and death. See life. — Close matter. See close. — Coloring matter. See color. — Common matter, that which all things have in common; being. — Contingent matter. See contingent. — Dead matter. See def. 4 (b).

First matter. (a) In metaph., matter informed and chaotic. (b) The material or substance of which anything is composed. Also prime matter, materia prima. — For that matter, as far as that goes, as far as that is concerned.

For that Matter, Sir, be ye Squire, Knight, or Lord, I'll give you whate'er a good man can afford.

Prior, Down-Hill, st. 11.

Intelligible matter. See intelligible. — Live matter. See def. 4 (b). — Matter of a proposition, the subject of the proposition, also called the material matter, in contradistinction to the formal matter, which is the fact signified. — Matter of a syllogism, the propositions and terms of the syllogism. The formal matter of a proposition has, since the twelfth century, been distinguished as natural, contingent or casual, and remote or unnatural, according as the character signified by the predicate term must, may or may not, or cannot, inhere in the subject. — Matter of cognition. See def. 2 (c). — Matter of composition, or permanent matter, that of which anything consists. Matter of fact. (a) A reality as distinguished from what is fanciful, hypothetical, or hyperbolic.

Lady Snare. Strange, indeed! Craik. Matter of fact, I assure you.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 1.

(b) In law, that which is fact or alleged as fact. In contradistinction to matter of law, which consists in the resulting relations, rights, and obligations which the law establishes in view of given facts. Thus, the questions whether a man executed a contract and whether he was intoxicated at the time, relate to matters of fact; whether, if so, he is bound by the contract, and what the instrument means, are matters of law. The importance of the distinction is that in pleading allegations of the former are essential, and of the latter unnecessary, and that the former are usually questions for the jury, the latter for the judge. (c) A particular element or fact of experience.

Some particular existence, or as it is usually termed, matter of fact. Locke, Human Understanding, IV. xvi. 5.

What is the nature of that visible which assures us of any real existence and matter of fact beyond the present testimony of our senses?

Hume, Human Understanding, IV.

Matter of generation, or transient matter, that out of which anything is made, as seed. — Matter of law. See matter of fact (b). — Matter of record, that which is recorded or which may be proved by record. In law the term imports a judicial, or at least an official record. See record. — Second matter, in metaph., matter formed. See 1st matter. — Sensible matter, the matter of sensible things. Signate, designate, determinate, or individual matter, that which is diverse, though not in any character different in all individuals. This distinction originated with Thomas Aquinas. — Spiritual matter, the matter of the incorruptible body after the resurrection. — Standing matter, composed types that have not yet been printed or molded from, or that have been so used and are not available for further service. To make a matter of conscience. See conscience. To make matter, to make no matter. See make. — Upon the matter, upon the whole matter, on the whole; taking all things into view.

So that upon the matter, in a great wit, deformity is an advantage to cringing.

Keats, Isabella.

Waller, with Sir William Balfour, exceeded in home but were upon the whole matter equal in foot.

Clarendon.

What's the matter with (a thing or act)? what is your objection to it? — a humorous use, at once assuming that objection has been made, implying that there is no ground for the objection, and recommending the thing or act mentioned.

matter (mat'ér), v. [matter, n.] I. intrans.

1. To be of importance; import; signify; chiefly used in negative and interrogative phrases; as, it does not matter; what does it matter?

For Scylla and Charybdis were men vile and of no account, neither mattered it where they lurked.

Sir H. Scud., tr. of Tacitus, p. 161.

To a man of virtue and honour, indeed, this mattered little.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xvii.

2. To form pus; collect or be discharged, as matter in an abscess; also, to discharge pus.

Each slight was mattered. Sir P. Sidney.

Earth's milk 's a ripened core, That drops from her disease that matters from her core.

Quaker, Emblems, I. 12.

II. trans. 1. To regard; care for; mind.

I repulsed her once, and again, but she put by my repulses and smiled. Then I began to be angry; but she mattered that nothing at all.

Keats, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 224.

The low land is sometimes overflowed with water in the time of harvest, yet they matter it not, but gather the crop and fetch it home wet in their canoes.

Dodgson, Voyages, II. 1, 25.

I had rather receive Money than Letters. I don't matter Letters, so the Money does but come.

N. Baskin, tr. of Colloquium of Erasmus, I. 104.

2. To approve of. Halberd. [Prov. Eng.]

matterful (mat'ér-fúl), a. [matter + -ful.] Full of matter, substance, good sense, or the like; pithy; pregnant.

NOTE: A. J. HARRIS.

Borne, full of years and honours, to a mausoleum surpassing in magnificence any that Europe could show.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xviii.

maut (mkt), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of maul.

mauther (má'vú-ér), n. [Also moather, mother, mudder; perhaps a dial. use of mother. Cf. the cognate Li. mudder, mudder, mudder, aunt, cousin, lit. mother.] A rustic girl; a gawky young woman; a wench. [Prov. Eng.]

Away, you talk like a foolish mauther.

H. Johnson, Alchemist, iv. 4.

P. I am a mauther that do want a service
Qu. O thou art a Norfolk woman (ery thee mercy)
Where maiths are mauthers (mauthers), and mauthers are maiths.
Brome, Eng. Moor, iii. 1. (Nares.)

When once a giggling mauther you,
And I a red-fao'd chubby boy,
Broomfield, Rural Tales (1902), p. 5. (Nares.)

"Cheer up, my pretty mauther!" said Mr. Peggotty.
Dickens, David Copperfield, xxxi.

mauvaise honte (mó-váz' óit'), f. [F.: mauvaise, fem. of mauvais, bad (false); honte, shame.] False modesty; bashfulness; shyness.

Nothing but strong excitement and a great occasion overcomes a certain reserve and mauvaise honte which I have in public speaking, not a mauvaise honte which in the least confuses me or makes me hesitate for a word, but which keeps me from putting any fervor into my tone or my action.
Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 217.

mauvaises terres. See bad lands, under land.

mauvais sujet (mó-vá' sú-zhét'), f. [F.: mauvais, bad; sujet, subject, person.] A bad fellow; a "hard case."

mauvanine (móy-an' i-lin), n. [< mauve + aniline.] A coal-tar color ($C_{19}H_{17}N_3O$) used in dyeing, prepared from the resinous residue from the arsenic-acid process of making manganenta. It dyes silk and wool a fast violet.

mauve (moy), n. and a. [< F. mauve, mallow; see mallow.] I. n. A reddish-purple dye obtained from aniline, the sulphate of the base mauveine; also, the color produced by it: so called from the resemblance of the color to the purple markings of the petals of mallows. It is now almost out of use. Also called Perkin's purple, aniline violet, and aniline purple.

II. a. Of the color of mauve: as, a mauve dress.

In April [1787] the Queen [Marie Antoinette] bought four yards of ruban mauve, an item worth nothing, since many persons imagine that mauve, as the name for a colour, is as modern as magenta.
Portugally Rev., N. S., XLII. 287.

mauvein, mauveine (mó'vin), n. [< mauve + -in, -ine.] The base ($C_{22}H_{21}N_3$) of aniline purple or mauve: same as mauvein.

But it was not until 1856 that Perkin prepared mauveine, the first aniline dye, on a large scale.
Newbold, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 3.

maver (má'vér), n. and v. Same as marrer.
maverick (mav'ér-ik), n. [So called from one Samuel Maverick, a Texan cattle-raiser, who, according to one account, relying upon the natural conformation of his cattle-range to prevent escape, neglected to brand his cattle, which, having on one occasion stampeded and scattered over the surrounding country, became confused with other unbranded cattle in that region, all such being presumed to be "Maverick's"; whence the term maverick for all such unbranded animals in the cattle region.] 1. On the great cattle-ranges of the United States, an animal found without an owner's brand, particularly a calf away from its dam, on which the tender puts his own or his employer's brand; or one of a number of such animals gathered in a general round-up or muster of the herds of different owners feeding together, which are distributed in a manner agreeable upon.

Unbranded animals are called mavericks, and when found on the round-up are either branded by the owner of the range on which they are, or else are sold for the benefit of the association.
T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 607.

Hence — 2. Anything dishonestly obtained, as a saddle, mine, or piece of land. [Western U. S.]

maverick (mav'ér-ik), v. t. [< maverick, n.] To seize or brand (an animal) as a maverick; hence, to take possession of without any legal claim; appropriate dishonestly or illegally: as, to maverick a piece of land. [Western U. S.]

mavis (má'vis), n. [Also formerly or dial. ma-rish; < ME. mavis, mavis, mavice, < OF. mavis, mavis, F. mavis, also mauvette, dial. mavietard = Sp. mavis, mavis = It. malicucco, malicucco, dial. malicucco (ML. malicuccus), a mavis; prob. of Celtic origin: cf. Bret. mifid, mifid, mifid, mifid.]

a mavis, Corn. melmet, melhuca, a lark.] The song-thrush or thrush, Turdus musicus, a well-known thrush common in most parts of Europe. It haunts gardens and woods near streams and meadows. Its song is sweet and has considerable compass; it can be made to repeat musical airs, and in some instances to articulate words. This name, still common in Scotland, is now rare in England. See thrush.

And bonny sang the mavis
Out o' the thorny brake.
Lairds (Child's Ballads, III. 90).

The mavis is the sweetest bird
Next to the nightingale.
Courteous Knight (Child's Ballads, VIII. 274).

Big mavis, the middle-thrush [East Lothian, Scotland.]

mavish (má'vish), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of mavis.

"Like two young mavishes," Mr. Peggotty said. I knew this meant, in our local [Norfolk] dialect, like two young thrushes.
Dickens, David Copperfield, III.

mavis-skate (má'vis-skát), n. The largest British ray, Raja oryphincta, sometimes 8 feet long and broad.

mavortial (má-vór'shnl), a. [< L. Mavors (Mars), Mars; see Mars, mavortial.] Martial; warlike.

Once I was guarded with mavortial bands.
Loerie, iv. 1. (Eucly. Dict.)

maw (má), n. [< ME. maw, mawc, maghe, < AS. maga = D. magge, mag = MLG. mage, LA. mage, mag = OHG. mago, MHG. mage, G. mag = Lecl. magi = Sw. mage = Dan. mave (cf. It. dial. magone, crop of birds, magu, maw, < OHG.), maw, stomach: the native Teut. word for 'stomach.'] 1. The stomach: now used of human beings only in contempt, and rarely of animals.

Rigte as hony is yuel to delve (digest) and englymeth (eloyeth) the maw.
Piers Plowman (B), xv. 65.

They shall give unto the priest the shoulder, and the two cheeks, and the maw.
Deut. xviii. 3.

Help us to mave free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
Milton, To the Lord General Cromwell.

2. The crop or craw of a fowl.

Granivorous birds have the mechanism of a mill; their maw is the hopper which holds and softens the grain, letting it down by degrees into the stomach.
Arbuthnot.

3. The sound or air-bladder of a fish.

Isinglass or fish glue, in its raw state, is the "sound," maw, or swimming bladder of various kinds of fish.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 333.

4. Stomach; appetite; inclination.

Unless you had more maw to do me good. Beau and Fl.

maw (má), v. A dialectal (Scotch) form of maw.

On the fifteenth day of May
The meadows will not maw.
Proud Lady Margaret (Child's Ballads, VIII. 80).

maw (má), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of maw.

maw (má), n. [Origin obscure.] An old game at cards, played with a piquet pack of thirty-six cards by any number of persons from two to six. Halliwell.

Methought Lucetta and I were at maw; a game, uncle, that you can well skill of. Chapman, May-day, v. 2.

My lord, you were bent to try a set at maw.
Ford, Love's Sacrifice, III. 2.

maw-bound (má'bound), a. Costive; constipated.

maw (má), n. [< ME. maw, mawc, a contr. form of mauch, < Lecl. muth = Dan. muthik = Norw. mukk, a maggot; n. dim. of the simple form which appears in AS. mawc = D. t. made, etc., a maggot: see mad, mad, < F. maddock.] A maggot. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

maw (má), n. [Short for mawkin, malkin.] A slattern. [Prov. Eng.]

mawkin (má'kin), n. See malkin.

mawkish (má'kish), a. [< maw + -ish.] 1. Maggoty. [Not found in this literal sense. Compare mucky, 1.] Hence — 2. Louthsome; apt to cause loathing or nausea; sickening.

Like a faint traveller whose dusty mouth
Grows dry with heat, and spits a mawkish froth.
Armstrong, in of Virgil's Georgics, IV.

3. Insipid; sickening; sickly: as, mawkish champagne; mawkish sentimentality.

This state of man
Is not a situation of betweenness.
As some word-colours are disposed to call it —
Meaning a mawkish as it were fish state.
One, using neither loss nor hate.
Widdow, Peter Pindar, p. 204.

Flow, welated, flow! like thine inspirer, beer;
Though stale, not ripe; though thin, yet never clear:
So sweetly mawkish, and so smoothly dull:
Heady, not strong; o'erflowing, though not full.
Pope, Dunciad, III. 171.

mawkishly (má'kish-ly), adv. In a mawkish way.

mawkishness (má'kish-ness), n. 1. Mawkish, sickly, or sickening quality. — 2. Sickly or qualmish sentimentality.

The imagination of a boy is healthy, and the mawkish imagination of a man is healthy; but there is a space of life between, in which the soul is in a ferment, the character undecided, the way of life uncertain, the ambition thick-sighted; thence proceeds mawkishness.
Keats, Endymion, Pref.

mawks (máks), n. A dialectal variant of maw.
mawky (má'ki), a. [Also mawky; < maw + -y. Cf. mawkish.] 1. Maggoty. [Prov. Eng.] — 2. Mawkish.

Even John Dryden penned none but mawky plays, nor did Byron succeed at all as a dramatist.
Jon Ber, Essay on Samuel Foote, p. xxiii.

mawmt, n. An obsolete form of malm.

mawmet, n. See maumet.

mawmetry, n. See maumetry.

mawmish, a. See maumish.

mawmouth (má'mouth), n. The calico, grass-, or strawberry-bass, Pomoxys sparoides, a centrarchoid fish. [Local U. S.]

mawn (mán), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of maund.

mawp (máp), n. [Cf. nope, alp.] The bullfinch of Europe, Pyrrhula vulgaris. See cut under bullfinch. [Prov. Eng.]

mawseed (má'séd), n. The seeds of the opium-poppo, Papaver somniferum: so called from being used as food for cage-birds, especially when molting.

mawskin (má'skin), n. The stomach of a calf prepared for making cheese; rennet. [Prov. Eng.]

maw-worm (má'wérn), n. An intestinal worm which may be found in the stomach, as a pin-worm or threadworm, such as Oxyuris vermicularis.

max (maks), n. [Said to be an abbr. of maxime, and orig. applied to gin of the best kind, < F. maxime, < L. maximus, greatest: see maximum.] A kind of gin.

Boxers to max at the One Tun in Jermy Street.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends.

maxilla (mak-sil'á), n.; pl. maxillæ (-é). [L., the jaw-bone, jaw, dim. of maxilla (> mála, jaw), < V. max in maxillare, soften, maxillate, = Gr. V. mas, pay, in maxar, knead, púca, a kneaded mass; see mass, minga, etc.] In anat. and zool.: (a) A jaw or jaw-bone; a maxillary bone; especially, a bone of the upper jaw, as distinguished from the mandible. When the term is applied to both jaw-bones, they are distinguished as maxilla superior and maxilla inferior, the supramaxillary and infamaxillary bones. (b) Specifically, the supramaxillary bone proper, as distinguished from the premaxillary or intermaxillary, which is often fused therewith in the higher vertebrates. (c) In entom., as in insects and arachnids, one of the second pair of gnathites: either one, right and left, of the second or lower pair of horizontal jaws, next behind or below the mandibles. In the maxilla, thus forming the under jaw of insects, may be distinguished several parts, as the basal joint or cardo, the footstalk or stipes, the palp-bearing or palpiger, and the blade or lacinia. See cuts under Hymenoptera, Insecta, and Arachnida. (d) In U. natacea, the right or left one of either of the two pairs of gnathites which come next after the mandibles, between these and the maxillipeds. The maxilla of a crustacean thus correspond to those of an insect, but there is an additional pair of them. — Composite maxillæ, dentate maxillæ, etc. See the adjectives.

maxillar (mak-sil'ár), a. Same as maxillary.

Maxillaria (mak-sil'á-ri-á), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), so called in allusion to the resemblance between the lip and column and the jaws of an animal, < L. maxilla, the jaw.] A genus of orchids of the tribe Fandea, type of the subtribe Maxillariæ, characterized by an erect concave lip with erect lateral lobes and a fleshy column. They are epiphytes arising from pseudobulbs, with usually one or two flat leaves which are coriaceous, thin, or slightly fleshy. The flowers are large or of medium size, often beautiful and fragrant. There are about 180 species, natives of tropical America.

Maxillariæ (mak-sil'á-ri-é), n. pl. [NL. (Benthau and Hooker, 1883), < Maxillaria + -æ.] A subtribe of the tribe Fandea of the natural order Orchideæ, characterized by leaves that are not plaited and a column (or the part that bears the stamens and pistils) produced into a claw-like foot. It contains 9 genera, all American, and about 176 species.

maxillary (mak-sil'á-ri), a. and n. [< L. maxillaris, of the jaw, < maxilla, the jaw-bone, passing into each other, and may in many constructions being purposely or inevitably used with more or less indefiniteness. The principal uses are as follows: (a) To indicate subjective ability, or abstract possibility: rarely used absolutely (as in the first quotation), but usually with an infinitive (not, however, as a mere auxiliary). See also might.

For and thou over me my tid, as y over thee may,
Weel bittin' thou woldst me bynde.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 167.

If thou consider the number and the manner of thy blisses and thy sorrows, thou woldst not forsaken (canst not deny) that nart yet blissful.
Chaucer, Boethius

Therefore whanne it made not be aggheweld to these things, it behouethighon to be censed, and to do nothing folli.
Wyck, Acts xix. 30.

Thel turned a-moon to flight, who that myght sonest, so that noon a-bode other.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 574.

Ask me not, for I may not speak of it Tennyson, Holy Grail.

(b) To indicate possibility with contingency.

What-soever thou be seruyd, Ioke thou be feyn,
For els thou may want it when thou hast nede Booke of Providence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 60.

For she said within herself, If I may but touch his garment,
I shall be whole.
Mat. ix. 21.

Things must be as they may. Shak., Hen. V., ii. 1. 23.

I am confirm'd,
Fall what may fall.

Plether (and another), Queen of Corinth, l. 1.

Though what he learns he speaks, and may advance
Some general maxims, or be right by chance.
Pope, Moral Essays, l. 3.

Let us keep sweet,
If so we may, our hearts, even while we eat
The bitter harvest of our own device.
Waltter, Amy Wentworth.

It might be May or April, he forgot,
The last of April or the first of May.
Tennyson, The Brook.

The young may die, but the old must!
Lonsfellow, Golden Legend, iv.

In this sense, when a negative clause was followed by a contingent clause with if, may in the latter clause was formerly used elliptically, if I may meaning 'if I can control it' or 'prevent it'.

My body, at the leaue way,
Ther shal no wight defoule, if I may.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 600.

"Say boldly this wille," quod he,
"I nyl be wroth, if that I may."
For nought that thou shalt to me say."
Hum. of the Rose, l. 3000.

Sometimes may is used merely to avoid a certain bluntness in putting a question, or to suggest doubt as to whether the person to whom the question is addressed will be able to answer it definitely.

How old may Phillis be, you ask,
Whose beauty thus all hearts engages?
Prior, Phillis's Age.

The proterit might is similarly used, with some slight addition of contempt.

Who might be your mother,
That you insult, exult, and all at once,
The wretched!
Shak., As you Like It, iii. 5. 35.

(c) To indicate opportunity, moral power, or the absolute power residing in another agent.

As I shall dreyne son, anche as thet ben, and the names how thet clopen hom; to suche entent, that see more knows the difference of hom and of othere.
Manderly, Travels, p. 68.

For who that doth not whome he may,
Whome he wolde hit wol be nay.
Curser Mundi, (Hollivell.)

He loved hym entirely, and fain wolde he that he a bood stillu yet it myght be.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 631.

Easily thou myghtest have perleued my wanne cheekes
... to forshew jat then, which I confesse now.
Lily, Euphons and his England, p. 355.

Thy yield him thee asleep,
Where thou myght knock a nail into his head.
Shak., Tempest, iii. 2. 60.

(d) To indicate permission: the most common use.

Thou mayest be no longer steward
Luke xvi. 2.

An I may hido my face, let me play Thishy too.
Shak., M. N. D., l. 2. 33.

I might not be admitted.
Shak., T. N., l. 1. 25.

In this sense may is scarcely used now in negative clauses, as permission refused amounts to an absolute prohibition, and accordingly removes all doubt or contingency.

(e) To indicate desire, as in prayer, aspiration, imprecation, benediction, and the like. In this sense might is often used for a wish contrary to what can or must be. as, O that I might recall him from the grave!

May you live happily and long for the service of your country
Dryden, Dool. of Rind.

Certain as this, O! might my days endure,
From age inglorious and black death secure.
Pope, Illiad, viii. 68.

That which I have doue,
May He within himself make pure Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

(f) In law, may in a statute is usually interpreted to mean must, when used not to confer a favor, but to impose a duty in the exercise of which the statute shows that the public or private persons are to be regarded as having an interest.

B. As an auxiliary: In this use notionally identical with may in the contingent uses above, in A (d), but serving to form the so-called compound tenses of the subjunctive or potential mode, expressing contingency in connection with purpose, concession, etc. May is so used—(1) In substantive clauses, or clauses that take the place of or are in apposition with the subject or object or predicate of a sentence: introduced by that.

It was my secret wish that he might be prevailed on to accompany me.
Byron.

They apprehended that he might have been carried off by gipsies.
Southery.

I heard from an old officer that when in the West Indies he was told by a lady, at whose house he was dining, that he might not like the soup, as it was made from snakes.
N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 335.

(2) In conditional clauses. (Rare, except in clauses where periphrasis is distinctly expressed.)

Lands, goods, horse, armour, anything I have is his to use, so somewhat may die.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 53.

(3) In concessive clauses.

Whatever the stars may have betokened, this August, 1749, was a momentous month to Germany. G. H. Lewes.

A great soul may inspire a sick body with strength; but if the body were well, it would obey yet more promptly and effectually.
J. P. Clarke, Self-culture, p. 68.

(4) In clauses expressing a purpose.

Was it not enough for thee to bear the contradiction of sinners upon Earth, but thou must still suffer so much at the hands of those whom thou didst for, that thou mightest bring them to Heaven?
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. vi.

Constantine had separated his forces that he might divide the attention and resistance of the enemy.
Gibbon.

magnus, OL. majus, great: see *may*¹.] 1. The fifth month of the year, consisting of thirty-one days, reckoned on the continent of Europe and in America as the last month of spring, but in Great Britain commonly as the first of summer.

In the month of May the citizens of London of all estates, generally in every parish, and in some instances two or three parishes joining together, had their several mayings, and did fetch their maypoles with divers warlike shows; with good archers, morrice dancers, and other devices for pastime, all day long; and towards evening they had stage-plays and bonfires in the streets.
Stow, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 454.

Mayaca (mä-yak'ä), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), from the native name.] The type and only genus of plants of the natural order Mayacaceae.
There are about 7 species, natives of North and South America from Virginia to Brazil. They are small moss-like marsh or semi-aquatic plants, with inconspicuous white, pink, or violet flowers.

Mayacaceae (mä-yä-kä'sä-ë), n. pl. [NL.
(Kunth, 1843), < Mayaca + -aceae.] A natural order of monocotyledonous plants belonging to the series Coronarier, and characterized by having regular flowers, three stamens, and a one-celled ovary with three parietal placentae and many orthotropous ovules. The order contains but one genus, Mayaca.

hand, composed of from five to seven wedge-shaped divisions. The yellowish, pulpy, slightly acid fruit, somewhat larger than a pigeon's egg, is sometimes eaten, and the creeping rootstock affords one of the safest and most active cathartics known. Also called mandarin, hop-apple.

2. The plant P. Emodi of the Himalayas; also, a related plant of the western United States, Achlys triphylla.—3. Same as honey-suckle-apple. [U. S.]

maybe (mä'bē), adv. [Also dial. webbe; an ellipsis of it may be. Cf. mayhap.] Perhaps; possibly; probably.

other species of the same genus. See cute under dog-bug and June-bug. [Southern U. S.] mazer-tree (mä'zär-trē), n. The common maple of Great Britain, Acer campestre. Also mazer-tree.

mazer-wood (mä'zär-wüd), n. 1. Same as mazer, 1.—2. Gutta-percha. See the quotation.

In the Museum Tradescantianum . . . the following entry occurs: . . . "The plicable mazer wood, being warmed, will work to any form." This museum became the nucleus of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. The word "mazer," variously spelt, often occurs in early English poetry, and is especially mentioned in old catalogues and wills. It is by no means impossible that mazer cups may have been made of gutta-percha, as its lightness, strength, and non-liability to fracture would recommend it; and curiously enough one of the vernacular names of the tree yielding gutta-percha is "mazer wood tree." Kings. Brit., xi. 338.

mazily (mä'zi-li), adv. In a mazy manner; by winding and turning; with confusion or perplexity.

The brooks of Eden mazy murmuring.

Tennyson, Experiments in Quantity, Milton.

maziness (mä'zi-nēs), n. The state of being mazy or mazed; perplexity or perplexingness.

mazological (maz-ō-lōj'i-kāl), a. [mazology + -al.] Mastological; mammalogical.

mazologist (mä-zol'ō-jist), n. [mazology + -ist.] A mastologist or mammalogist.

mazology (mä-zol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. μαζα, breast, + -λογία, logia, logy, speak: see -ology.] Mammalogy; mastology; theriology.

mazurka (ma-zör'kä), n. [Also as F. mazurka; Pol. mazurka, a dance, Pol. Mazur, a native of Mazovia, Poland.] 1. A lively Polish dance, properly for four or eight pairs of dancers, originally performed with a singing accompaniment. The steps and figures are various, and may be improvised. The more modern mazurka is a polka with two sliding steps instead of one, the music is in triple time. 2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is triple and moderately rapid, with a capricious accent on the second beat of the measure. Older mazurkas usually have a drone bass. The prominence of the mazurka form is mainly due to the predilection shown for it in the works of Chopin.

mazy (mä'zi), a. [maze + -y.] Having the character of a maze; perplexing from turns and windings; winding; intricate.

Then out again he flies, to wing his mazy round.

Hence mine. Cf. myself.] A pronoun of the first person, used only in the oblique cases (accusative and dative, classed together as objective), and supplying these cases of the pronoun I.

"Me, me," he cry'd, "turn all your words alone On me! the fact-content, the fault my own."

Dryden, Amiel, ix.

The dative occurs—(a) To express the indirect object as, give me a drink; bring me that book.

What me biddeth other biddeth
The schal the forward holden alle.

King Horn (R. E. T. S.), p. 63.

Pay me that thou owest.

Mat., xviii. 28.

(b) To express the indirect object in mere reference or mention—that is, to bring into the predicate, as an apparent indirect object, the actual subject (the ethical dative); a form of expression adding a certain life or vivacity to colloquial speech, and therefore a favorite one in Shakespeare and other Elizabethan dramatists.

Come me a page of Amphitruus, who with humble smiling reverence delivered a letter unto him from Clinias.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, III.

He plucked me ope his doublet and offered them his throat to cut.

A strong liquor made by mixing honey with water and flavoring it, yeast or some similar ferment being added, and the whole allowed to ferment. It was a favorite beverage in the middle ages, and is made according to different recipes in different parts of England down to the present day. When carefully made it will keep for a long time, and improve with age.

And being now in hand, to write this glorious preface,

Fill me a bowl of meath, my working spirit to raise.

Dryden, Polyolbon, IV. 112.

meadow (med'ō), n. [ME. medow, medow, medwe, AS. mād (nom. and acc. sing.), pl. māðea, māda, medea (the nom. sing. māðea, f., and māda, m., being rare and uncertain; stem mādu- or mādu-) = OFries. mede = D. mat, a meadow, = MIst. mede, maide = OHG. mala* (malla*), in comp. mala-scech, a grasshopper, MIst. mate, matte, G. matte, also matt (esp. in place-names), a meadow; usually referred, as 'a place mowed' or 'to be mowed,' to the verb mað, AS. mācan; but the noun, with the formative -d(-th) from the verb is math (AS. māth = OHG. mād, MIst. māt, G. mahd, etc.), a different word, and the AS. word in its orig. form (stem mādu-) can hardly be so formed from mācan, mow, there being no recognized formative -d-. But possibly the root mād-, mād- (the formative being -w-), may be cognate with L. mētere, reap, mow, which may contain an extended form of the root of mow: see mow.] 1. A low, level tract of land under grass, and generally mown annually or oftener for hay; also, a piece of grass-land in general, whether used for the raising of hay or as pasture-land. Meadows are often on the banks of a river or lake, but so far above the surface as to be dry enough to produce grass and herbage of a superior quality. In some parts of the United States, as New England, land so situated is called meadow or meadow-land without reference to its use, and in other parts, especially in the West, bottom or bottom land.

Made hem alle to assemble in the Dukes lande in a grete meadow upon a river.

Merlin (E. T. S.), I. 70.

This golden meadow, lying ready still

Then to be mow'd when their occasion will.

Daniel, Panegyric to the King's Majesty.

2. A feeding-ground of fish, as eel. Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1877, p. 541.—3. An ice-field or floe on which seals herd.—Floating meadow, flat meadow-land adjoining a river or other source of water supply, by means of which it can be drained at pleasure.—Half meadow, low ground subject to occasional overflow by extraordinary tides, and producing coarse grass that can be used for hay, called half-grass.

The mean and true longitudes agree therefore at perihelion and aphelion. - Mean moon, an imaginary moon, supposed to move with an equable motion in the ecliptic, and in the same period as that which the real moon takes to perform a revolution with an unequal motion. - Mean noon the moment when the mean sun passes the meridian. - Mean place, in logic, a place which partly agrees with the nature of the things to be proved, and partly differs from the same. The mean places are conjugates, cases, and divisions. - Mean position, in astronomy, a position of the wrist midway between pronation and supination, with the thumb above the fingers. - Mean proportional, the second of any three quantities in continued proportion. - Mean solar day. See day, 3. - Mean space, meanwhile.

Mean space entreats our friends not to be too hussle in answering matters, before they know them.

Cushman, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 56. - Mean sun, in astronomy, an imaginary or fictitious sun, moving uniformly in the celestial equator, and having its right ascension always equal to the sun's mean longitude. Its hour-angle at any moment defines the mean time or clock-time, just as the hour-angle of the actual sun defines the apparent or sundial time. The use of the mean sun in time-reckoning is necessitated by the fact that, owing to the eccentricity of the earth's orbit and the inclination of the equator to the ecliptic, the sun's real motion in right ascension is seriously variable, and the days, hours, etc., of apparent solar time have, therefore, no fixed length. See day, 3. - Mean term, in logic, same as middle term (which see, under middle). - Mean time, a system of reckoning time such that all the days and their like subdivisions are of equal length, its day being the mean interval between the two successive passages of the sun over the meridian of any place. The mean time at any moment may be defined as the hour angle of the mean sun at that moment. (See mean sun.) Mean time is the time usually employed for civil and scientific purposes, and is the time indicated by an ordinary clock or watch, properly regulated. Apparent time is that indicated by a correctly adjusted sun-dial; the difference between the mean and the apparent time at any moment is called the equation of time, and sometimes slightly exceeds a quarter of an hour. - Mean voice, in music, a voice or voice part intermediate between the highest and the lowest, as a tenor or an alto. - Mean way, meanwhile.

In the mean way they [Lerius and his fellows] passed by the Tapestry Parable Onocates, all which, however, they exercise hostilities and mutual disagreements, yet agree in like barbarous and righteous Rites.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 337.

To cut a line in extreme and mean ratio. See extreme. - Mean. See II.

II. n. 1. The middle point, place, or state between two extremes; a middle path or course; a middle or intermediate kind, quality, rate, or degree; hence, the avoidance of extremes; absence of excess; moderation.

occupy the mean by steadfast strength, for at that ever is under the mean or else at that overpasseth the mean despoilth wofulness.

Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 7.

There is no mean; either we depart from God and stick to the devil, or depart from the devil and stick to God.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 62.

'Tis a sin against
The state of princes to exceed a mean
In mourning for the dead.

Ford, Love's sacrifice, l. 1.

We shall hold the immutable mean that lies between insensibility and anguish.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, vii.

The happy mean between these two extremes.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

2. Intervening time; interval of time; interim; meantime.

Reserve her cause to her eternal dooms;

And, in the mean, vouchsafe her honorable tombs.

Spenser, F. Q., II. l. 58.

3. In music: (a) A middle voice or voice-part, as the tenor or alto.

Thi organys so hille begynne to syng ther mean,
With treble mean and tenor discordyng as I guess.

B. Jonson, Underwoods, xcviii.

(b) The second of a set of violas; an alto.

Their chief instruments are Rattles made of small gourds, or Pumpkins shells. Of these they have Bass, Tenor, Countertenor, Mean and Treble.

Capt. John Smith, Works, l. 186.

(c) Either the second or the third string of a viol, the former being the small mean, and the latter the great mean. - 4. A quantity having a value intermediate between the values of other quantities; specifically, in math., the average, or arithmetical mean, obtained by adding several quantities together and dividing the sum by their number. In general a mean is a quantity which depends upon certain other quantities according to any law which conforms to these two conditions: first, that if the quantities which determine the mean should all be equal, the mean would be equal to any one of them; and second, that no transposition of the values of the determining quantities among themselves can alter the value of the mean. (See geometrical mean, below.) The ancients recognized ten kinds of mean (arithmetic, geometric, harmonic, contraharmonic, mediant, subcontraharmonic, subharmonic, subcontraharmonic, and contraharmonic), distinguished by ordinal numbers, to which Jordanus Nemorinus added an eleventh. Only the first four, the arithmetical, geometrical, harmonic, and contraharmonic, are true means.

5. In logic, the middle term in a syllogism. - 6. A mediator; an intermediary; an agent; a broker; a go-between.

Thogh that our hertes sterne ben and stoupe, Thow to thy Sene canst be swich a mean
That alle our gyltes he forgyveth clene.

Chaucer, Mother of God, l. 83.

For the am I become Rytwyse game and earnest, swich a mean
As maken women unto men to comen.

Chaucer, Troilus, III. 254.

7. A subservient agency or instrumentality; that which confers ability or opportunity to attain an end; now rare in the singular, the plural form being used with both singular and plural meanings; as, means of travel or of subsistence; by this means you will succeed.

Be that *mean*e the ette for to wyne.

Gower, Confessio (F. E. T. 8.), l. 952.

Let me have open means to come to them.

Shak., Rich. III., iv. 2. 77.

An outward and visible sign (a sacrament) of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained . . . as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof.

Book of Common Prayer, Catechism.

What person trusted chiefly with your guard,
You think is aptest for me to corrupt
In making him a mean for our safe meeting.

Chapman, Gentleman I. 1.

8. Causative agency or instrumentality; contributory aid or assistance; help; support; only in the plural form, in the phrase by means of, or by (or through) . . . means: as, we live by means of food; it came about through their means.

That by means of death . . . they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance.

Heb. ix. 15.

Our brother is imprison'd by your means.

Shak., Rich. III., l. 3. 78.

Specifically - 9. pl. Disposable resources; elements of ability or opportunity; especially, pecuniary resources; possessions; revenue; income.

The widow and the fatherless
He would send means unto,
True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 357).
He has never called his honor, which, with his title, has outlived his means.
Shakespeare, The Duchess, II. 3.
Arithmetical mean. See def. 4. - Arithmetico-geometrical mean. See arithmetico-geometrical. - By all means, certainly; on every consideration; without fail; as, go, by all means.

Yes, yes, the epigram, by all means.
Sherriden, School for Scandal, II. 2.

By any means. (a) By all means.

Tell her
She must by any means address some present
To the cunning man.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, v. 2.

(b) In any way; possibly; at all.

I have always defected you, and said I didn't think you so ugly by any means.
Sherriden, School for Scandal, III. 1.

By no manner of means, in no possible way; not in the least. - By no means, not at all; certainly not; not in any degree. - Center of the harmonic mean. See harmonic. - Contraharmonic mean and proportion. See contraharmonic. - Geometrical mean, the mean obtained by multiplying two quantities together and extracting the square root of the product. In general, the geometrical mean of a quantities is the *n*th root of their product. - Golden mean, in morals, moderation; the avoidance of extremes in either of two contrary ways. - Harmonic mean. See harmonic. - Means of grace. See grace. - Quadratic mean, the square root of the arithmetical mean of the squares of the given quantities. - To make means, to take steps; and one's way.

We having made means for our speedy flight, as we were issuing forth we were bewayed by yu barking of a dog.

Webb, Travels, p. 28 (ed. Arber).

After she had been in prison three or four days, she made means to the governor, and submitted herself, and acknowledged her fault in disturbing the church.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 322.

SYN. 1. Mean, Medium, Average, Mediocrity. Mean and medium represent the middle point or degree. Mean is much used in mathematics. (See arithmetical mean, geometrical mean, etc., above.) Mean is also much used in morals; as, in conduct we are to observe the golden mean; Aristotle held that each virtue was a mean between vice of defect and a vice of excess. Medium has this latter sense but is used chiefly in matters of practical life; as, goods that are a medium between the best and the poorest; a color that is a medium between two others. In this sense medium is much used as an adjective; as, a medium grade, color, price. Means is the form of mean that corresponds to medium when it stands for that which, by being between others, is the agency for communication, etc. As mean and medium generally imply simply two extremes, but may imply several quantities of different amounts or degrees, so average may imply simply two extremes, but generally implies several quantities of different amounts or degrees. As, the average of 3, 5, 7, and 9 is 6. The latter word has similar figurative uses; as, the man's education was better than the average. Mediocrity is now used only in an unfavorable sense, implying blame or contempt; as, talents not above mediocrity - that is, very moderate. - 7. Instrument, method, mode, way, expedient, resource, appliance.

MEAN⁴ (mēn), v. [< ME. meenen, < AS. mēnan, lament, moan; see moan, the present E. form. The AS. is often identified with mēnan, mean, but the difference of meaning makes it necessary to treat it as a distinct word.] I. intrans. To moan; lament; mourn; complain.

Dem. And thus she meanes, videlicet:
This, Asleep, my Love? What, dead, my Dore?
O Piramus, arise! Shak., M. N. D., v. 1. 330 (folio 1622).

II. trans. To bemoan; lament; used reflexively.

Whanne I had al me mened no more nold he seie
But "certeinly, swote damicelle, that me sore rowe."

William of Palerne (F. E. T. 8.), l. 561.

mean⁵ (mēn), v. t. [An aphetic form of de-mean.] To demean; carry; conduct.

As good a gentleman born as thou art: nay, and better meant Mardon, Jonson, and Chapman, Eastward Ho, l. 1.

Oh, wives, hereafter, mean your hearts to them
You give your holy vows.

Shirley, Love's Cruelty, v. 2.

meander (mē-an'dēr), v. [Formerly also meander; = F. méandre = Sp. Pg. It. meandro, < L. méander, < Gr. μέανδρος, a winding stream or canal, any winding pattern, so called from the river Meander. L. Mæander, Mæandrus, Mæandros, < Gr. Μαίανδρος, a river, now called Mendere, which flows with many windings into the Aegean Sea near Miletus.] 1. A winding course; a winding or turning in a passage; a maze; a labyrinth.

Here's a maze trod, indeed,
Through forth-rights and meanders!

Shak., Tempest, III. 2. 3.

There is another way, full of meanders and labyrinth.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 17.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I, II, 226.

measles (mē'zlx), n. [Early mod. E. also measels, meazels, meazels, meazels, meazels, meazels; rarely and erroneously in sing. (in sense 1), early mod. E. meayll, meayll, meayll; < ME. measles, measles, measle, meaylle, measles (glossing ML. morbillus, scurpula, cariola, OF. ruygrolen), < MD. measlen, measlen, also measlen, measlen = G. measern, measern, lit. 'little spots' (cf. smallpox, orig. small pocks, 'little pustules'), pl. of MD. measel, measel = MLG. measle, measle, a spot, eruption, pustule, = OHG. masala, a bloody tumor, G. mazer, a spot, speckle, as on wood or on the skin; dim of MI mase* = MLA. mase = OHG. mase, MLG mase, G mase, a spot, the mark of a wound, whence also ult. mazer, a bowl or of spotted wood: see mazer. The word measles, ML, measles, masales, is entirely distinct from ML, meas, a leprosy, whence measly, leprosy, but has been more or less confused with it, as in MD, meas-sucht, MLG meas-sucht, meas-sucht, meas-sucht, meas-sucht, defined as "the measles-sickness" (Hexam), or measles, but prop. the 'leprosy-sickness', or leprosy. The words meas, measly became nearly obsolete before the 17th century, in ME, the words were pronounced differently. Hence the equiv. meas-lings, q v. The singular measle (def. 1, above) appears to have been developed from the plural (which is now used as singular), in the sense 'a spot like those of measles', and not in the orig. lit. sense (in ML, etc.) of 'a little spot'.

1. A contagious disease of man, with an incubation period of about nine or ten days, and a period of invasion of about three or four days, in which there are pyrexia and rapid pulse, inflammation of the mucous membrane of the eyes and upper air-passages, and bronchitis, followed by an eruption of small rose-colored papules, which arrange themselves in curvilinear forms. The period of eruption usually lasts about four days. The eruption is succeeded by a brain-like degeneration. The poison is conveyed directly from the patient through the air and by fomites. It is given off in the period of invasion as well as in later periods. Also called rubella and morbilli.

So shall my lungs
Coh words till they decay against those measles
Which we disdain should tetter us yet sought
The very way to catch them. Shak (Cor, III 1 78)
Petrarch (II) the disease we call the Measles or Measles marks

From whence they start up chosen vessels
Made by contact, as men get measles
Butler, Hudibras, I III 1348

2. An old name for several diseases of swine or sheep, caused by the scab or mite or of a tape-worm, and characterized by reddish watery pustules on the skin, cough, feverishness, and discharge at the nostrils.—3. A disease of plants; any blight of leaves appearing in spots, whether due to the attacks of insects or to the action of weather. See measle, 1.

Frail babies are often infected with the measles by being smothered with the sun
Mortimer Husbandry

4. See measle, 2. False, French, German, or hybrid measles, rubella. Black measles, a malignant form of measles formerly of not infrequent occurrence, perhaps the result of the method of treatment adopted. Syl See See measle-worm (me'z'le worm), n. The scolex of a tapeworm, a measles.

measlings (mez'lings), n. [= Sw masling, measling = Dan masling (pl); as measle + -ing.] The measles. Hallmark [Prov Eng] measly (me'zli), a. [ME measli + -y] 1 Infected with measles or the measles, as an animal or its flesh, especially pork.

Last trotted forth the guth swine
In case he hit against the stump,
And dinnally was head to whine,
All as he scrubbed his measly rump.

Swift, on Cutting down the Old Thorn at Market Hill

2. Good-for-nothing, miserable, wretched, contemptible. [Low] measendow, n. [See also measendow, measendow; ME measendow, measendow, measendow, measendow, etc., OF measendow, orig. measendow de Dieu, a hospital, lit. God's eternal duration is permanent and invisible, not measurable by time and motion Bentley Sermon

A measurable function
Maudsley, Mind, XII 507.

2. Moderate; temperate; limited; of small quantity or extent; as, to meet with measurable success.

Be meke & measurable nought of many wordes,
Be no tellers of tales but trewe to this lord
William of Palerne (E E T 8.), I 332.

O wiste a man how many maladyes
Folwen of exence and of glorynges,
He wolde been the more measurable
Of his date, sittinge at his table
Chaucer Pardoner's Tale, I 58.

Measurable or measurable music. See measurable, 2. measurableness (mez'h'ul a-bl-n), n. The property of being measurable or admitting of mensuration.

measurably (mez'h'ul a-bl), adv. 1. In a measurable manner.—2. Moderately; in a limited degree.

Who yafe answere falle softe and demurely,
With oute of chaungyng of colour or of courage
You thyng in haste but measurably Political Poems (L. (ed. Furnival), p 60.

Wine measurably drunk and in season bringeth gladness measure (mez'h'ur), n. [ME measure, measur, OF measur, Pr measur, measura = Sp measura = Pr measura, measura = It misura, < CL mensura, a measuring, mensura, a thing to measure by, < metri, pp. metri, measure. See metri] 1. A unit or standard adopted to determine the linear dimensions, volume, or other quantity of other objects, by the comparison of them with it; a standard for the determination of a unit of reckoning. Measures of length are either line measures or end measures. Line measures are objects having lines marked upon them between which it is intended that the measurement shall be made, and end measures are objects (bars) between the ends of which it is intended that the measurement shall be made.

A perfect and just measure shalt thou have.

Who hath comprehended the dust of the earth in Isa xl 12.

With his shears and measure in his hand
Shak K John iv 2 1981

Nothing then could serve well for a convenient measure of time but what has divided the whole length of its duration into apparently equal portions by constantly repeated periods. Locke, Human Understanding II xiv 18.

2. Hence, any standard of comparison, estimation, or judgment.

But money may make a man a measure of the pence, (After) [according to] that his power is to payen) his penance shall fall.

Piers Plowman's Crede (F E T 8.), I 571
The natural measure whereby to judge our things is the sentence of Reason Hooker, Ecclus Polity I 4

Some valuing those of their own side or mind,
Still make themselves the measure of mankind
Pope Essay on Criticism, I 481

3. A system of measurement; a scheme of denominations or units of length, surface, volume, or the like, as, weights and measures, long measure, square measure, etc.

That he himself was skilled in weights and measures
... there is no reason to doubt Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins

4. The dimensions or extent of a thing as determined or determinable by comparison with a unit or standard; size, extent; capacity (literal or figurative); volume, duration; quantity in general.

Both the cherubims were of one measure and one size
1 Ki vi 25

Lord make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days
Ps xxxix 4

If else thou seek it
Aught, not surpassing human measure say
Milton, P L, vii 640

The elder Mirabeau clearly enounced the doctrine that "the measure of subsistence is the measure of population."
Amer Anthropologist, I 1

It is possible to determine the forms of the planetary orbits, their positions, and their dimensions, in terms of the earth's mean distance from the sun as the unit of measure with great precision.
Newcomb and Holden Astronomy, p 214.

5. An act of measurement or comparison with a standard of quantity, or a series of such acts; as, to make clothes to measure.

Even now a tailor call'd me in his shop,
And there (that took measure of my body
Shak, C, of K, iv 2 2.

6. A definite quantity measured off or meted out; as, a measure of wine or meal. In some places, as applied to certain things, a measure is a known quantity, the word being used specifically. Thus in England a measure of corn is a Winchester bushel. In Connecticut a measure of oysters is five quarts.

To measure about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel 2 Ki vii 1.

Be large in faith, soon we'll drink a measure
The table round.
Shak, Macbeth, III 4 11.

7. Used absolutely, a full or sufficient quantity. [Rare.]

I'll never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine,
Or fortune given me measure of revenge
Shak, 3 Hen, VI, 2 3 22

8. Quantity, amount, extent, or any dimension, as measured or meted out; the result of any mensural determination or rule: as, the measure of or for the beams is 10 feet 4 inches; full or short measure. In many technical uses measure has specific applications, according to the particular case involved. Thus in printing, the measure of a line, page, or column is its width stated in equa.

(Good measure pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom.
Luke vi 38.

9. Moderation; just degree or proportion; reasonable bounds or limits: as, beyond measure; within measure.

We should keep a measure in all things Latimer, Misc, Ser.

Measure is a merry mean, as this doth shew,
Not too high for the pye, nor too low for the crow, Heywood's Proverbs (ed. 1582). (Hadith.)

There is a measure in everything
Shak, Much Ado, II 1 74.

10. Degree; proportion; indefinite quantity.

Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure Ps lxxxv 8.

If you will fish for a Carp, you must put on a very large measure of patience. J Walton Complete Angler, p 145.

There is a great measure of discretion to be used in the performance of confession
Jer Taylor

It is not in human nature to deceive others for any long time without in a measure deceiving ourselves also.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I 125.

11. In pros.: (a) Determination of rhythm by division into times or groups of times; rhythm, as so determined; meter. In ancient prosody the unit of measure is the primary time or mora. See mora. (b) A group of times or syllables used to determine the length of a colon, period, or meter. In ancient prosody the measure was sometimes a single foot (monopody), and some times a pair of feet (dipody). Iambic trocheic, and anapestic rhythms were as a rule measured by dipodies, other meters by monopodies. The measure was marked as such by beating time, the secondary time of a dipody not receiving the beat. According to the number of measures contained in it, a meter was designated as monometer, dimeter, trimeter, etc. and these terms are those still in use for modern poetry, some writers, however, counting every foot a measure.

Meter and measure are all one, for what the Greeks call metron, the Latins call mensura, and is but the quantity of a verse either long or short.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng Poets, p 55.

(c) A rhythmical period or meter, especially as determined by division into such groups; a rhythm line, or verse.
Long, stately, and swelling measures, whose graver movement accords with a serious and elevated purpose
E C Steadman, Vic. Poets p 28.

12. In music: (a) One of the groups of tones or of accents included between any two primary or heavy accents or beats. A measure always begins with such a primary accent, and includes one or two (or even more) secondary accents with various possible lesser accents. Most rhythms may be reduced to measures having either one primary and one secondary accent or one primary and two secondary accents, the former rhythm being called duple and the latter triple. Measures are indicated in printed music by bars, one of which is placed before each primary accent. All the notes between two bars are said to belong to the same measure or bar. The essential structure of the measures in a given piece of music is indicated at the beginning by the rhythmic signature. See signature. (b) Same as tempo.

[Rare.]—13. Any regulated or graceful motion; especially, motion adjusted to musical time.

Hath not my gait in it the measure of the court?
Shak, W T, iv 4 787.

14. A slow, stately dance or dance-movement.

Wooling wedding, and repenting is as a Scotch jig, a measure and a cinque pace. The first suit is hot and busy, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical, the wedding, mannerly modest, as a measure, full of state and stately.

Shak Much Ado, II 1 77.

My dancing—well I know what our usher said to me last time I was at the school. Would I might have led Philanthia in the measure!

R. Johnson, Cynthia's Revels, IV 1.

He took her sc. hand, ere her mother could bar—
"Now tread we a measure!" said young Lochinvar.
Scott, Marmion, v 12.

15. A determinate action or procedure, intended as means to an end; anything decided or done with a view to the accomplishment of a purpose; specifically, in later use, any course of action proposed or adopted by a government, or a bill introduced into a legislature: as, a measure (that is, a bill or bills) for the relief of the poor; a wise measure; rash measures.

That pole, which many who profess to bend of their measures, is in fact to regulate their measures has nothing better in view than the appropriation of men.

Johnson, Rambler.

Measures, not men, have always been my mark.

Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, II.

16. pt. In geol., a set or series of beds, as in coal-measures, the assemblage of strata in which the coal of any particular region occurs.—17. In fencing, the distance of one fence from another at which the one can just reach the other by lunging. To come into measure is to approach an opponent near enough to reach him with the sword-tip by thrusting and lunging.—Above or beyond measure, to an indefinitely great degree or extent; exceedingly.

Martin having rejoiced above measure in the abundance of light.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, II. 3.

Beyond measure I persecuted the church of God.

Cal. I. 13.

Absolute measure. See absolute.—Angular measure, the system of units employed for measuring angles. It is based on the measurement of the circumference of a circle described with the vertex of the angle as its center. The circumference is regarded as divided into 360 equal parts called degrees; a right angle is thus the angle subtended at the center by the fourth part of the circumference, or is 90 degrees. The table is:

60 seconds (60")	= 1 minute (1')
60 minutes	= 1 degree (1°)
360 degrees	= 1 circle or circumference.

Apothecaries' measure, the system of units employed by apothecaries in compounding and dispensing liquid drugs. The table in use in the United States is Gallon.	Pints.	Fluidounces.	Fluidrachms.	Minims.

1	= 8	= 128	= 1024	= 61440
	1	= 16	= 128	= 7680
		1	= 8	= 480
			1	= 60

The capacity of the gallon is 231 cubic inches. The pint of the British Pharmacopoeia (being the eighth part of the gallon of 277.274 cubic inches) is divided into 20 fluidounces, with the fluidrachm and minim constituting the same subdivisions of the fluidounce as in the above table. The cubic capacity of the gallon can, however, be stated only approximately. The standards are made to contain a certain weight of water at a certain temperature. See gallon.

—Barren measures. See barren.—Binary measure. See binary.—Cartesian measure of force. See Cartesian.—Circular measure. (a) A system of measurement used in trigonometry, in which the unit is the angle subtended by an arc equal in length to the radius—usually, 57° 17' 44". (b) Same as angular measure.—Cloth-measure, the standard system of linear units employed in measuring cloth. The table is:

Yard.	Quarters.	Nails.	Inches.
1	= 4	= 16	= 36
	1	= 4	= 9
		1	= 3

The English ell is 5 quarters, and the Flemish ell about 3 quarters. See ell.—Common measure. See common.—Compound measure. See compound.—Cubic measure, the system of units employed for measuring volume, formed from long measure by taking the cubes of the linear dimensions. The table is:

Cubic yard.	Cubic feet.	Cubic inches.
1	= 27	= 46656
	1	= 1728

Decimal measure. See decimal.—Dry measure, the system of units ordinarily used in measuring dry commodities, such as grain, fruit, etc. The table is:

Quarter.	Bushels.	Pecks.	Gallons.	Quarts.	Pints.
1	= 8	= 32	= 64	= 256	= 512
	1	= 4	= 8	= 32	= 64
		1	= 2	= 8	= 16
			1	= 4	= 8

A pot is 2 quarts; a load of grain is 5 quarters, and a last 10 quarters. The approximate capacity of the Imperial (British legal) bushel is 2,218.192 cubic inches. of the Winchester (United States legal) bushel, 2,150.42 cubic inches. (See apothecaries' measure.) The United States bushel is thus equivalent to .9048 British bushel.—Gravitation measure of force. See gravitation.—Greatest common measure of two or more numbers or quantities, the greatest number or quantity which divides each of them without a remainder.—Heaped measure. See heap, n. t.—Imperfect measure. See imperfect.—In a measure, to some extent.—Linear or linear measure. See long measure, below.—Liquid measure, the system of units ordinarily used in measuring liquids. The table is:

Gallon.	Quarts.	Pints.	Gills.
1	= 4	= 8	= 32
	1	= 2	= 8
		1	= 4

For the capacity of the gallon, see apothecaries' measure.—Long measure, linear or linear measure, the system of units ordinarily used in measuring length. The table is:

Mile.	Furlongs.	Poles, Rods, or Perches.	Yards.	Feet.	Inches.
1	= 8	= 320	= 1760	= 5280	= 63360
	1	= 40	= 220	= 660	= 7920
		1	= 5½	= 16½	= 198
			1	= 3	= 36
				1	= 12

Other units considered as belonging to long measure are the pace, 5 feet; the fathom, 6 feet; the span, 9 inches; the hand (used in measuring the height of horses), 4 inches; the surveyors' chain or Gunter's chain, of 100 links 66 feet; the chain of 100 links (United States), 100 feet 2.2 inches. See also date-measure, above.—Measure of a number or quantity, in math., a number which is exactly contained in another two or more times.—Measure of a value, the expression in any system of logarithms, or the exponent of the power to which the value is equal, the exponent of some given ratio being assumed as unity. See ratio.—Measure of capacity, dry or liquid measure.—Measure of curvature. See curvature.—Measure of solidity. Same as cubic measure.—Metric measure. See metric system, under metric.—Net measure. See net.—Out of measure, out of proportion; disproportionately; immoderately; excessively.

And his Lord dures the in very brade 4 Monethes for-aynes and in lengthe-out of measure.

Manderly, Travels, p. 277.

He saith they (Brazilians) live 1500 yeares, and that their women are out of measure luxurious.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 283.

Small measure, in some parts of the United States, a measure containing a quarter of a peck, used especially in marketing for dry vegetables.—Square measure, the ordinary system of units for measuring and expressing area, including the acre and rood and the square of the units of the ordinary long measure. (See land-measure.) The acre is 10 square chains, or 100,000 square links.—To take the measure of, to observe narrowly so as to form a judgment concerning.—Winchester measure. See bushel, 1.—Within measure, within bounds.—With measure, fully.

He cannot but with measure fit the honours Which we devise him.

Shak., Cor., II. 2. 127.

Measure (mez'h'gr), n.; pret. and pp. measured, ppr. measuring. [ME. meowren, COF. (and F.) mesuror = Pr. Sp. mesuror = Fr. mesurer, mesurar = It. misurare, L. mensurare, measure, mensura, measure; see measure, n. (Fr. mensuration.)] 1. trans. 1. To ascertain the length, extent, dimensions, quantity, or capacity of by comparison with a standard; ascertain or determine a quantity by exact observation. To measure a length, a standard of length is employed; this is laid down so that its beginning coincides with the beginning of the length to be measured, and its other end is marked; it is then laid down again in the same way, with its first end where its last end previously came, and so on, counting the number of times it is laid down. Finally, if there remains a length less than that of the standard, this is measured by subdividing the length of the standard into a sufficient number of equal parts, and using one of these as a secondary standard. Measurements are also effected by reference to units of area or of capacity, as well as by means of weighing, etc.

In London measuring ylt cranes are.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 47.

Suppose that we take two stations situated north and south of each other, determine the latitude of each, and measure the distance between them.

Newcomb and Holden, Astronomy, p. 201.

2. To serve as the measure of; be adequate to express the size of; often used figuratively.

An ell and three quarters will not measure her from hip to hip.

Shak., C. of E., III. 2. 113.

3. To estimate or determine the relative extent, greatness, or value of; appraise by comparison with something else; with by before the standard of comparison.

In all which the king measured and valued things antique, as afterwards appeared.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 16.

Who is there almost that measures wisdom by simplicity, strength by suffering, dignity by lowliness?

Milton, Church Government, II. 1.

Measuring merit by adventitious circumstances of greatness.

Goldsmith, The Bce., No. 2.

4. To bring into comparison or competition; oppose or set against as equal or as a test of equality; with with.

Their pleasant tunes they sweetly thus apply'd: . . . With that the rolling sea . . . them flly answered; And on the rocks the waves breaking aloft A solemn Meare (tonor) unto them measured.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 33.

All start at once: (Oileus led the race; The next Ulysses, measuring pace with pace.

Pope, Iliad, xliii. 898.

He was compelled to measure his genius with that of the greatest captain of the age.

Prescott, Ford. and Isa., II. 14.

5. To pass over or through.

Thou hast measured much ground, And wandred, I were about the world round.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., Septuagier.

We must measure twenty miles to-day.

Shak., M. of V., III. 4. 84.

6. To adjust; proportion; suit; accommodate.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, not your fortunes by your desires.

Jer. Taylor.

7t. To control; regulate.

The philosopher . . . him betecheth The lore, howe that he shall measure His bodie, so that no measure Of fleshly lust he shulde exceede.

Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

8. To allot or distribute by measure; apportion; mete; often with out.

With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

Mat. vii. 2.

Of Eight great Hoars, Time measures out the Sands; And Europe's Fate in doubtful Balance stands.

Prior, Letter to Holles Despreux, 1701.

What thou seest is that portion of eternity called time, measured out by the sun.

Addison, Spectator, No. 168.

To measure one's length, to fall or be thrown down at full length; lie or be laid prostrate.

If you will measure your lubber's length again, larry; but away!

Shak., Lea., I. 4. 100.

To measure strength, to ascertain by trial which of two parties is the stronger; specifically, to engage in a contest.—To measure swords, to fight with swords.

Miss Tattle, who was by, affirmed . . . that Sir H. Hoquet and Tom Raunter were to measure swords on a similar provocation.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 1.

II. trans. 1. To take a measurement or measurements.—2. To be of a (specified) measure; give a specified result on being compared with a standard: as, a board measures ten feet.—Measuring east. See east.—measured (mez'h'grd), p. a. 1. Definitely ascertained or determined by measurement or rule; set off or laid down by measurement; adjusted or proportioned by rule.

A positive and measured truth.

Baron, Advancement of Learning, I.

The rest, no portion left That may disgrace his art, or disappoint Large expectation, he disposes neat At measured distances.

Corper, Task, III. 24.

2. Characterized by uniformity of movement or rhythm; rhythmical; stately; formal; deliberate: as, to walk with measured tread.

His voice was clear, but not agreeable; his enunciation measured and precise.

Tragott, Ford. and Isa., II. 28.

3. Limited or restricted; within bounds; moderate: as, to speak in no measured terms.—Measured music. See measurable, 2.

measuredly (mez'h'grd-ly), adv. Deliberately. [Rare.]

Measuredly came the words from her lips.

R. Broughton, Cometh up as a Flower, xii.

measureless (mez'h'gr-less), a. [measure + -less.] Without measure; unlimited; immeasurable.

What air, not yet at rest? The king a bed . . . and shut up In measureless content.

Shak., Macbeth, II. 1. 17.

measurelessness (mez'h'gr-less-ness), n. The state or quality of being unmeasured, or incapable of being measured; immoderateness.

measurably (mez'h'gr-ly), adv. [measure + -ly.] Moderately.

Yet measurably boasting, with neighbors among, Shall make thee beloved, and live the more long.

Tupper, Good Husbandry Lessons, 2.

measurement (mez'h'gr-ment), n. [measure + -ment.] 1. The act of measuring; mensuration.

The exact length of any aliquot part of it [the circle], such as 1 . . . is not beyond the limits of very exact measurement.

Herschel, Outlines of Astron. (1833), § 208.

All must determine the distance of the moon as well as that of the sun to be able to complete our map on a known scale of measurement.

Newcomb and Holden, Astronomy, p. 316.

2. A system of measuring or measuring: as, builders' measurement.—3. An ascertained dimension; the length, breadth, thickness, depth, extent, quantity, capacity, etc., of a thing as determined or determinable by measuring; size, bulk, area, or contents. — Builders' measurement, a method of computing the tonnage of merchant vessels in use among ship-builders. Its results are nearly double the legal or registered tonnage. — Measurement goods, light goods which are charged for carriage by the bulk of the packages, as distinguished from heavy goods, which are charged by weight. — New measurement, a more accurate method than that formerly in use of arriving at the cubic capacity of a ship available for stowing cargo. The model of the ship affects the computation of tonnage with the old measurement, it varying very largely. The new measurement superseded the old by act of Congress about 1864. See tonnage. — Units of measurement. See unit.

measure-moth (mez'h'gr-moth), n. A geometrid or looper. See looper, 2.

measurer (mez'h'gr-er), n. One who or that which measures.

The world's bright eye. Time's measurer, begun Through watery Cypris on his course to run.

Howell, Poem Royal to His Majesty, Jan., 1661.

Specifically: (a) One whose occupation or duty it is to measure land commodities in market, etc. (b) One who measures work on a building as a basis for contractors' prices. (c) Formerly, an officer in the city of London who measured wooden cloths, coats, etc. Also called a meter. — See also (d) An instrument or apparatus used in measuring. (e) In culm, a measuring-worm.

measuring-chain (mez'h'gr-ing-eh-an), n. The surveyors' chain, containing 100 links of 7.92 inches each (Gunter's chain), or 100 links of 1 foot each. See chain and link.

measuring-faucet (mez'h'gr-ing-fä'set), n. A faucet, or a contrivance performing the function of a faucet, designed to measure the amount of a liquid passing through it. Such faucets are used in delivering liquids in bulk, in putting them up in cans, etc.

measuring-funnel (mez'h'gr-ing-fun'el), n. A funnel with a valve to close the nozzle, fitted with a graduated scale indicating the quantity of liquid contained in it.

measuring-glass (mez'h'gr-ing-glas), n. A graduated glass vessel used by chemists, pharmacists, and others for measuring fluids.

measuring-line (mez'h'gr-ing-lin), n. A line used for measuring lengths.

measuring-machine (mez'h'gr-ing-ma-shen), n. A device for the exact determination of length or end-measurement. Such instruments usually consist of a metallic bed piece with a head stock at each end, of sliding bars which in shape are true rectangular parallelepipeds, and of a combination of two or more accurate micrometer screws, attached to the head stocks, and driven by graduated wheels so as to advance or retract the bars, which slide in a groove between the head stocks.

measuring-pump (mez'h'gr-ing-pump), n. A pump used for measuring liquids. Each stroke delivers the same volume, and the strokes are counted, or the pump is connected with registering mechanism adjusted to indicate the number of strokes or the total volume discharged.

measuring-tape (mez'h'gr-ing-tap), n. A tape-measure or tape line.

measuring-wheel (mez'h'gr-ing-hwöl), n. A small wheel of known circumference, fitted by its axis to a handle, used to measure the circumference of round bodies, as that of a carriage wheel when the tire is to be fitted; a circumference or tire-measure.

measuring-worm (mez'h'gr-ing-worm), n. The larva of any geometrid moth; a looper; so called from its mode of progression; same as geometer. 3. See cut under Cidaria.

G. medallio = Dan. medaile = Sw. medall) = Sp. medalla = Pg. medalha = L. medaglia, ML. reflex medallia, medalla, medalla, medalla, medale (> OHG. medilla, medila, MHG. medele), a medal, < L. as if metallea, < L. metallum, metal; see metal.] A piece of metal, usually circular in form, bearing devices (types) and inscriptions, struck or cast to commemorate a person, an institution, or an event, and distinguished from a coin by not being intended to serve as a medium of exchange. The word is also sometimes used to designate coins, particularly ancient coins in the precious metals, or fine medieval or Renaissance coins, in collections. Some of the Greek and Roman coin-types are commemorative, and the Roman medallions were of a quasi-medallie character. Strictly speaking, however, the medal is a creation of modern times. The earliest, and in point of portraiture the finest, medals were produced in Italy about the middle of the fifteenth century by Vittore Pisano of Verona. Fine medals were also executed in Italy, Germany, and France during the sixteenth century. English medals began practically with the reign of Henry VIII. The earliest specimens are cast, but in the reign of James I. the process of striking began to be employed. Thomas Rawlin, Thomas Simon, and Abraham Simon (seventeenth century) are the principal medallists who were natives of England; but some of the best English medals were the productions of foreign artists, as Trezzu (time of Philip and Mary), Simon Passe (James I.), N. Briot (Charles I.), the Roettier family (Charles II.), and J. Croker (Anne).

An antique medal, half consumed with rust.

Boyle, Works, V. 545.

Italian and French writers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries use medallie and medallies to signify coins which, being no longer in circulation, were preserved in the cabinets of collectors as curiosities. Even in the last century our own word medal was so employed. The medals of the Roman Emperors to which Gibbon often alludes in his notes to the "Decline and Fall" are, of course, what are now known as coins; and Addison's "Dialogue upon the Usefulness of Medals" is, for the most part, a treatise on Roman Imperial coins.

medal (med'-al), v. t.; pret. and pp. medaled or medalled, ppr. medaling or medalling. [< medal, n.] To decorate with a medal; confer a medal upon; present with a medal as a mark of honor. [Rare.]

Irvyng went home, medalled by the king, diplomatised by the university, crowned, and honoured, and admired. Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, Nil nisi Bonum.

medal-cup (med'-al-kup), n. A drinking-vessel of metal, usually silver, in which coins or medallions are inserted and form a part of the decoration. Usually these coins are so inset that both sides can be seen, the interior of the cup as well as the exterior being in this way made ornamental. In some cases a series of coins of a single sovereign or of a succession of sovereigns is used.

Silver Medal-cup. (The medals are all of the Duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbützel.)

medalet (med'-al-et), n. [< medal + -et.] Any medal of small size. When not larger than, for example, the English florin or half crown, or United States half-dollar, medals are generally called by this name; but numismatists do not make any rigid distinction between medals and medallets.

I shall beg leave to give this class the appellation of medallies, as the genius of our language admits of this diminutive in ringlet, bracelet, and the like.

Pinkerton, Essay on Medals, I. § 12.

mediatize (mē'di-ā-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mediatized, pp. mediatizing. [< mediate + -ize.] 1. To make mediate; reduce from an immediate or direct to a mediate or indirect relation through the interposition of a secondary superior or controlling agency. Applied specifically to the process of converting one of the minor German states or princely families of the old empire from the semi-independent condition of having a direct share in the imperial government, and responsibility to it, to that of subordination to an intervening power by being annexed to it while retaining all local possessory and governmental rights. By this process, especially under the Westphalian treaties of 1804, and the changes leading to the dissolution of the old empire and the formation of the confederation of the Rhine in 1806, the number of mediatized states and princely families became very large.

The same peace [that of Lunéville] declared that all the secular princes who had lost territory by this cession were to be indemnified by the Empire. This was done at Regensburg in 1805. The indemnifying material was obtained by mediatizing all the free cities but six, and all the spiritual estates but two. — Louis, Bismarck, Int. p. vi.

"Your Highness," I said (it is a title appertaining to him as sprung from a mediatized family).

Medicago (med'ik-a'go), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. medica, medic, + term. -ago, as in tussilago, etc.] A genus of plants of the natural order Leguminosae and the tribe Trifoliceae; the clovers. It is characterized by a oblong keel and a scythe-shaped legume which is more or less spirally curved or twisted. There are about 40 species natives of Europe, Asia, and Africa, but now naturalized in other parts of the world. They are herbs, or rarely shrubs, with pinnately trifoliate leaves and axillary stipules, and usually small papilionaceous flowers, which are yellow, rarely purple, and grow in axillary racemes or heads, or sometimes almost solitary. The common name of plants of the genus is medic, sometimes small clover. M. sativa, with purple flowers, being an important fodder plant cultivated under the names of alfalfa and lucerne (which see). M. lupulina, the black medic or nonsuch, closely resembles the hypoclovers, and also shares their name but is distinguished by its black pods. It has some agricultural value when growing with other herbage. M. maculata, the spotted medic (heart clover), has a peculiar, slightly colic prickly pod. These species are all naturalized in the United States. M. arvensis is a shrubby species (tree medic) mountain-troff of southern Europe, said to promote the secretion of milk. M. scutellaria of the Mediterranean region is also a good fodder plant, resisting drought well. M. falcata is the yellow or sickle-podded medic.

Medicean (med'ik-ē-an), a. [< It. Mediceo (see def.), a surname (orig. pl. of medico, a physician;]

see medic¹, + -e-an.] Of or pertaining to the Medici, an illustrious family of Florence, appearing first as merchants of the medieval republic, and at the dawn of the Renaissance, in the fifteenth century, raised to supreme power through their liberality and merit. From this time on for three centuries, amid fortunes of varying brilliance, this family produced popes, sovereigns and tyrants, and it occupies a large place in the history of Europe. In the arts and literature the epithet has particular reference to Cosimo del Medici, known as Cosimo the Elder, and to Lorenzo the Magnificent. The former was virtual master of the Florentine republic from 1433 to 1464, and was a generous patron of the new art and letters founded on antique models; the latter was chief of the state in fact though not in name, from 1469 to 1492, a brilliant protector of all learning, particularly of that of Greece surviving from the wreck of Constantinople, and a powerful benefactor of the arts. The Popes Leo X. (Lorenzo's son) and Clement VII. (Gallo del Medici) carried on the traditions of the family in the fields of intellectual cultivation and achievement.

medieval, mediæval (mē-di-é-val), a. and n. [< L. medius, middle, + æram, age, period; see medium and age.] a. Pertaining to or characteristic of the middle ages; as, medieval art or architecture; the medieval spirit; a medieval habit of thought. See middle ages, under age.

The darkest portion of the medieval period was different in different countries. . . . In a general way, however, it may be assigned to the tenth century.

Hollam, Middle Ages.

Medieval architecture, the most important branch of medieval art including a great number of varied styles. This architecture embodies a union of the Greek system

Medieval Architecture of the best period — West front of Amiens Cathedral, France; 13th century of columnar construction with the Roman vaulting and arches, with the consequences flowing logically from the new combination. It may be considered as originating about A. D. 400, in the palace of the Emperor Diocletian at Spalato, in which columns were introduced as part of the free-standing shafts instead of the Roman piers with engaged columns, and in which the profile of the architecture was continued around the archivolts, which had changed the architect's function, and now sprang directly from the capital, abandoning the meaningless Roman interposition between archivolts and columns of a small section of a mock entablature. Despite local differences, medieval architecture represents a continuous development from the classical Roman to the modifications wrought by the Renaissance. At its origin, copying Roman models, it was poor and rude, owing to the lack of skill and of resources in its builders. Every succeeding generation sought to perfect the system of vaulted ceilings to which the characteristic forms of this architecture are due. The application of the Roman groin-vault was extended and brought into new combinations; the pointed arch and vault were evolved, as possessing more stability and elasticity than the old round arched forms; and finally the use of ribs to strengthen and support the vault was elaborated. By about 1250 medieval architecture could solve with the utmost economy and artistic excellence any problem that could be presented to masonry construction. From about 1250 architects, embarrassed no longer by inherent difficulties, began to lose the simple beauty of their style in unnecessary elaboration of details, as in complicated window-traceries and in distorted profiles of moldings; and architecture progressively declined, so that the simplification of external forms effected by the Renaissance was a gain. But the sound and scientific medieval methods of construction remained in great part beneath the Renaissance exterior, and indeed are not yet wholly abandoned, especially in France. Many fanciful theories have been formed as to the origin of medieval architecture, especially that deriving its groined vaulting from an imitation of the lines of interlacing branches in an avenue of trees. It was, however, in fact a thoroughly logical growth from classical models, and the result of consistent efforts to adapt means to the ends sought. Thus, the problem in a great church or hall was to cover in securely a large space with as few incursions as possible to light and sound, hence the tendency to widen the arches and to reduce the thickness of the pillars. The great height of such buildings was not induced by a desire to "soar heavenward," but by the necessity to secure light for the nave by windows placed above the roofs of the aisles. The typical decoration of this architecture is of the highest beauty and fitness, ornamenting but not masking the construction; and, while based chiefly on natural forms, it always, until the decline of the style, conventionalized these appropriately to their architectural function. This architecture attained its best development in France. See Byzantine, Romanesque, Pointed, etc. — Medieval art, the art of the entire middle ages in Europe, beginning in the gradual transformation of classical forms and ideas, and extending to the Renaissance, or, roughly, to the year 1500, though in Italy it actually became merged earlier in the new current of modern art, and in the north, as in England and Germany, it continued later. It embraces a countless number of regional and local styles and schools, yet all animated by a kindred spirit. It is second in importance in art-history only to the art of Greece; and, while in many ways it fell far short of Greek art, the course of its development from rude beginnings was very similar, and, like the Greek, presents a consecutive and sincere effort on the part of succeeding craftsmen and artists constantly to do better. Its ideal of beauty was less high than that of the Greeks; it was more of a didactic art, seeking, in its illuminations and painting and sculpture, to illustrate and enforce the teachings of the Bible and the inherent imperfection of man. Yet the general similarity of methods of observation and work was so close that in France especially after the close of the archaic period in the thirteenth century, much sculpture was produced, as that in the portals of the cathedral of Rheims and on the north transept of that of Amiens, which is in spirit thoroughly Greek, and is equal to all but the best Greek draped work. In decoration medieval art was preeminent. (Like Greek art, it was understood and appreciated not by a small cultivated class, but by the whole people. It consistently sought to give to the commonest tools and utensils beautiful forms and characteristic ornament; while the architectural sculpture and decorative combinations of forms have never been surpassed in their variety, in their beauty of execution, and in their fitness to the ends which it was sought to attain. To the general artistic sentiment religious fervor, and emulative spirit of the period made of the great cathedrals, embelished like a Greek temple, the best architecture and sculpture and the best decoration of the day, owe their origin. — Medieval history, Latin, etc. See the noun.

II. n. One belonging to the middle ages.

This view of landscape differs from that of the medievalists. Hudson medievalism, medievalism (mē-di-ē-val-izm), n. [medieval + -ism.] 1. That which is characteristic of the middle ages; the medieval spirit, practice, or methods in regard to anything; a peculiarity or characteristic of the middle ages.

Again, I say, it is a pity to have our language interlarded with Orientalisms and Medievalisms. Nineteenth Century, XIX, 305.

2. Devotion to or adoption of the spirit or practice of the middle ages; medieval tendency in thought or action, as with respect to religion or politics.

Even Abbotsford despite its cherished associations, served upon me a little, because I knew its medievalism was all carbon paper.

Miss Braden, Hostages to Fortune, p. 12.

medievalist, medievalist (mē-di-ē-val-ist), n. [medieval + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in the history of the middle ages. — 2. One who sympathizes with the spirit and principles of the middle ages; often with the sense of one who is antiquated or behind the times. — 3. One who lived in the middle ages.

You have but to walk aside, however, into the Palazzo Pubblico, to feel yourself very much like a thrifty old medievalist. H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 264.

medievalize, medievalize (mē-di-ē-val-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. medievalized, medievalized, ppr. medievalizing, medievalizing. [medieval + -ize.] To render medieval.

Mr. Fellows, the painter, had helped with the costumes, supplying some from his own artistic properties, and medievalizing others. Hurdell, Annals, xvi.

medilli, n. and n. A Middle English form of middle.

Medina (mē-di-nā), n. pl. [L. Meda + -ina.] A subfamily of Cypripedium, typified by the genus Meda. It is characterized by a short posterior dorsal fin armed with two spines, the posterior of which closes into a groove in the other, and by the adherence of the ventral fins to the abdomen by their inner margins. Few species are known, all confined to streams of the southwestern part of the United States.

Medina sandstone. See sandstone.

medine (mē-din), n. [Also medino; L. medius (Colgrave); appar. of Ar. origin.] A small coin and money of account in Egypt, the fortieth part of a piaster.

47 medines pass in value as the duckat of gold of Venice. Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 271.

Medinilla (mē-di-nill-ē), n. [N.L. (Gundlach, 1826), named after D. J. de Medinilla y Pineda, governor of the Marianne Islands.] A genus of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae, type of the tribe Medinilleae. It is characterized by eight, ten, or twelve nearly equal stamens, the anthers of the anthers two-lobed or spurred in front and with two lobes or one spur at the back, and a calyx tube scarcely longer than the ovary. About 75 species are known, natives of the East Indies, the Malay archipelago, Madagascar, and the islands off the west coast of Africa. They are erect or climbing shrubs, generally quite smooth, with opposite or whorled entire fleshy leaves and clusters of white or rose-colored flowers. Several of the species are very ornamental. The most common greenhouse species is perhaps M. magnifica, a beautiful plant with pink flowers.

Medinilla (mē-di-nill-ē), n. pl. [N.L. (Benthams and Hooker, 1867), L. Medinilla + -ae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae, typified by the genus Medinilla. It is distinguished by a berry like or coriaceous fruit, which breaks open irregularly, by having the stamens usually equal and recurved, with a connective lobed or spurred both at the back and in front, or only posteriorly, and by leaves which are not articulate between the primary nerves. The tribe includes 12 genera and about 145 species, all natives of the Old World.

medinot, n. Same as medine.

mediocr (mē-di-ō-kral), a. [mediocre + -al.] 1. Being of a middle quality; mediocre; as, mediocr intellect. Addison — 2. In entom., being of middle length. — Mediocr antennae, in entom., those antennae which have the same length as the insect's body or which, being turned backward on the body, attain the posterior extremity. Kerby

II. n. 1. One of middling quality, talents, or merit. Southery. [Rare] — 2. A monk between twenty-four and forty years of age, who was excused from the office of the choir and from reading the epistle and gospel, but performed his duty in choir, cloister, and refectory. Shipley.

mediocrist (mē-di-ō-krist), n. [mediocris + -ist.] A person of middling abilities; a mediocre person. [Rare.]

He (John Hughes) is too grave a poet for me, and I think, among the mediocrist in prose as well as verse. Shelley, To Pope, Sept. 3, 1785.

mediocrity (mē-di-ōk'ri-tē), n.; pl. mediocrities (-tiz). [F. médiocrité = Fr. médiocrité = Sp. mediocritad = Pg. mediocritade = It. mediocrità, L. mediocritas (-is), a middle state, mediocris, in a middle state; see mediocris.] 1. The character or state of being mediocre; a middle state or degree; a moderate degree or rate; specifically, a moderate degree of mental ability.

Albeit all bountye dwelleth in mediocrity, yet perfect felicity dwelleth in supremacy. Spenser, Shep. Cal., July, Emblems.

For modern Histories . . . there are some few very worthy, but the greater part beneath mediocrity. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II, 180.

His humanity, ingenuousness, and modesty, the mediocrity of his abilities. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., I, 24. Moderation; temperance.

Mediocrity, or the holding of a middle course, has been highly extolled in morality. Bacon, Physical Essays, vi.

Body and mind must be exercised, not one, but both, and that in a mediocrity. Hutton, Anat. of Man, p. 324.

3. A mediocre person; one of moderate capacity or ability; hence, a person of little note or repute; one who is little more than a nobody.

They proclaim, with a striking unanimity of bitterness, that their managers are nearly all mediocrities, with no training for the duties they venture to assume, without influence on the destinies of the country they pretend to govern. Nineteenth Century, XXIV, 674.

Syn. 1. Medius, Average, etc. See medius, n.

mediodorsal (mē-di-ō-dōr'sāl), a. [L. medius, middle, + dorsum, back; see dorsal.] Median and dorsal; situated in the middle line of the back; dorsomedial. Huxley and Martin.

mediopalatine (mē-di-ō-pāl'ē-tin), a. and n. [L. medius, middle, + palatum, palate; see palate.] I. a. Situated in the median line of the palate, as a suture; uniting the right and left palatal bones.

II. n. A mediopalatine bone.

Other formations which, like the mediopalatine, serve to bind the palatal halves together. Cover, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 178.

mediopectus (mē-di-ō-pēk'tus), n.; pl. mediopectora (-ō-rā). [N.L.] Same as medipector. Mediosubmedian (mē-di-ō-sub-mē-di-ān), a. [medius (an) + submedian.] In entom., common to or intervening between the median and submedian nervures of an insect's wing; as, the mediosubmedian interspace.

mediotarsal (mē-di-ō-tār'sāl), a. [L. medius, middle, + tarsus, tarsus; see tarsal.] Situated in the middle of the tarsus; especially, formed between the proximal and distal rows of tarsal bones; as, a mediotarsal ankle-joint. See tibiotarsal. Mediotarsal articulation, the kind of ankle joint which is characteristic of all those vertebrates below mammals which have a tarsus, the joint being formed between the proximal and distal of tarsal bones, not between the proximal row and the leg, as in mammals. It occurs in all birds, and in those reptiles which have tarsal bones.

mediotransverse (mē-di-ō-trāns-vōr's), a. [medius (an) + transverse.] Same as transmedian.

medioventral (mē-di-ō-vēn'trāl), a. [medius (an) + ventral.] In anat. and zool., median and ventral; situated in the middle line of the ventral or under side of an animal; ventrimedial. Also median-ventral.

medioximous (mē-di-ōk'sh-mus), a. [L. medioximus, medioximus, which is in the middle, superl., L. medius, in mediocris, in a middle state, L. medius, middle; see mediocris and mediocris.] Middlemost; intermediary.

The whole order of the medioximous in intermediary degrees. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Iniquity, I, xii § 6.

meditatio fugæ (med-i-tā'shi-o-fū'jō), [L., contemplation of flight; see meditation and fugue.] In Scott's law, a phrase noting the position of a debtor who meditates an escape to avoid the payment of his debts. When a creditor can make oath that his debtor, whether native or foreigner, in meditationes fugæ, or when he has reasonable ground of apprehension that the debtor has such an intention, he is entitled to a warrant to apprehend the debtor. The warrant may be obtained from any judge of the Court of Session, the sheriff, a magistrate of a burgh or a justice of the peace, and is termed a meditatio fugæ warrant. Under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1861, which abolishes imprisonment for debt except in a few special cases, warrants of this kind are practically obsolete. Imp. Dict.

meditation (med-i-tā'sh'n), n. [< ME. meditacioun, < OF. meditacion, F. méditation = Sp. meditacion = Pg. meditacão = It. meditazione, < L. meditatio (< L. meditari, meditate; see meditate.)] 1. The act of meditating; close or continued thought; the turning or revolving of a subject in the mind; sustained reflection.

Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer.
Ps. xix. 14.

And the imperial votaries passed on
In maiden meditation, fancy-free.
Shak., M. N. D., II. 1. 164.
It should be no interruption to your pleasures to hear me often say that I love you, and that you are as much my meditations as myself.
Donne, Letters, IV.
He, then, that neglects to actuate such discourses loses the benefit of his meditation.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 69.
Deep and slow, exhausting thought . . .
In meditation dwelt with learning wrought.
Ryron, Child Harold, III. 107.

2. Religious contemplation.
He is within, with two right reverend fathers,
Divinely bent to meditation.
Shak., Rich., III. 7. 62.

Meditations in order to a good life let them be an exalted as the capacity of the person and subject will ensure up to the height of contemplation, but if contemplation comes to be a distinct thing, and something besides or beyond a distinct degree of virtuous meditation, it is lost to all sense, and religion, and prudence.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 73.

3. In theol.: (a) A private devotional act, consisting in deliberate reflection upon some spiritual truth or mystery, accompanied by mental prayer and by acts of the affections and of the will, especially formation of resolutions as to future conduct. Meditation differs from study in that its principal object is not to acquire knowledge, but to advance in love of God and holiness of life. (b) A public act of devotion, in which a director leads a congregation in meditating upon some spiritual subject.—4. A short literary composition in which the subject (usually religious) is treated in a meditative manner; as, a volume of hymns and meditations.

But nathless this meditation
I putte it ay under correction
Of clerkes, for I am not textual.
Chaucer, Prolog to Parson's Tale, l. 65.

Mediterraneum mare*, the Mediterranean Sea, previously called Mare magnum, nostrum, internum); as a noun, the interior; < medius, middle, + terra, land. Cf. Mediterranean.] Same as Mediterranean.

They that have seen the mediterranean or inner parts of the kingdom of China, do report it to be a most amiable country Hakluyt's Voyages, II. II. 91.

And for our own ships, they went sundry voyages as well to your streights, which you call the Pillars of Hercules, as to other parts in the Atlanticque and Mediterranean Seas.
Bacon, New Atlantis.

Mediterranean (med'i-tā-rān'), a. [< mediterrane + -an.] 1. In the midst of an expanse of land; away from the sea; inland.

Their buildings are for the most part of timber, for the mediterranean countries have almost no stone.
The Kingdoms of Japan.

These facts appear to be opposed to the theory that rock-salt is due to the sinking of water charged with salt in mediterranean spaces of the ocean.
Darwin, Geol. Observations, p. 580.

2. Nearly or quite surrounded by land; existing in the midst of inclosing land; confined or cut off by a bordering of land; used specifically [cap.] as the name of the sea between Europe and Africa, the Mediterranean Sea, or (substantively) the Mediterranean, and rarely otherwise.—3. [cap.] Pertaining to, situated on or near, or dwelling about the Mediterranean Sea: as, the Mediterranean currents; the Mediterranean countries or races.—Mediterranean and mediterranean are sometimes used interchangeably. See the notes.—Mediterranean is used in geog., the second of four subregions into which the Palearctic region is divided. As bounded by Vahner, it includes all the countries south of the Pyrenees, Alps, Balkans, and Caucasus mountains, all the southern coast of the Mediterranean to the Atlas range and beyond to the extratropical part of the Sahara and the Nile valley to the second cataract; while eastward it includes the northern half of Arabia, all Persia and Baluchistan, and perhaps Afghanistan to the India.

That which holds a middle place or position; that which comes or stands between the extremes in a series, as of things, principles, ideas, circumstances, etc.; a mean.

They love or hate, no medium amongst them.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 107.

For there is no medium between living in sin and forsaking of it; and nothing deserves the name of hesitancy that is short of that.
Stillingfleet, Hermosa, III.

A generous friendship no cold medium knows;
Burns with one love, with one resentment glows.
Pope, Ilad, ix. 720.

The piece, however, has no medium; all that is not excellent is intolerably bad.

Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xi.

2. Anything which serves or acts intermediately; something by means of which an action is performed or an effect produced; an intervening agency or instrumentality: as, the atmosphere is a medium of sound.

Nothing comes to him not spoiled by the sophisticated medium of moral uses.
Lamb, Old and New Schoolmaster.

A negotiation was opened through the medium of the ambassador.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xviii.

The social medium has been created for man by humanity.
Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 167.

Specifically: (a) In painting, any liquid vehicle, as linseed-oil, poppy-oil, varnish, or water, with which dry pigments are ground, or with which pigments are mixed by the painter while at work, in order to give them greater fluidity. (b) In acoustics, a ponderable elastic substance, as air, ether, gas, water, etc., which transmits the energy of the sound-vibrating body in waves of condensation and rarefaction to the ear. (c) In heat and light, that which transmits the energy of the heated or luminous body to a distance in undulatory waves; the ether. (d) In bacteriology, the nutritive substance, either a liquid or a solid, in which or upon which the various forms of microscopic life are grown for study. The liquid media employed are infusions of hay, extract of beer-yeast, and broth of various kinds of meat. The solid media most used are eggs, slices of potatoes and carrots, agar-agar, and especially gelatin and the gelatinized serum of the blood of oxen. After being thoroughly sterilized by heat, they are usually placed in test-tubes, and inoculated with the form that it is desired to study; the cultures may then be observed through the glass.

3. A person through whom, or through whose agency, another acts; specifically, one who is supposed to be controlled in speech and action by the will of another person or a disembodied being, as in animal magnetism and spiritualism; an instrument for the manifestation of another personality. Many of the so-called spiritual mediums claim the power of acting upon and through matter, by means of the spirits controlling them, in a manner independent of ordinary material conditions and limitations. In this sense the plural mediums is preferred.

Although particular persons adopted the profession of media between men and spirits, there was no limitation of the power, in the view of ancient and modern, to any special class of the population.
Bunsen, in Nineteenth Century, XIX. 364.

4. Something of mean or medium weight; size, etc. [Colloq.] great, large, + ceros, horn.] The genus of large extinct Cervidae of which the Irish elk is the type having immense palmated antlers. The animal formerly called Cervus megaceros or C. hibernicus is now known as Megaceros hibernicus. It is related to the elk of Europe and the name of America, but is much larger. Its remains abound in the peat-bogs of England and Scotland.

megacerosus (meg'ā-se-rō-s), a. [cf. Gr. megas, great, large, + ceros, horn.] Having very large horns, as the extinct Irish elk.

Megachile (meg-a-kī'le), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + χίτων, lip.] A genus of aculeate hymenopterous insects, or bees, of the family Apidae and group Dasygaster; the leaf-cutters. It is a large genus, of world-wide distribution, containing many species of varied habits, all furnish their cells with bits of leaves cut from trees and plants, which they stick together and roll into cases to form their larval cells in the trunks of dead trees and old rotting palms. The nest of M. maculosa is composed of grains of sand glued together with its sticky saliva, and is so hard as not to be easily penetrated by a knife. About 50 European and as many North American species are known. M. centurionaria is one of the common species of Europe and North America.

Megachilidae (meg-a-kī'le-i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Megachile + -idae.] The leaf-cutting bees regarded as a family.

Megacocci (meg-a-kōk'i-si), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κόκκος, a berry; see coccus.] The largest kind of coccid; distinguished from micrococci.

Megacosm (meg-a-kōz-m), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + κόσμος, world.] Same as macrocosm.

I desire him to give me leave to set forth our microcosm, man, in some such deformed way as he doth the megacosm, or great world. (Latham.)

Megaderm (meg-a-dēr-m), n. [< NL. Megaderma.] A but of the family Megadermatidae.

Megaderma (meg-a-dēr-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + δέρμα, the skin; see derma.] The typical genus of the family Megadermatidae (or subfamily Megadermatinae of Nycteridae). M. gigas of Australia is the largest bat of the suborder Microchiroptera, the forearm measuring 11 inches. M. tyra is a smaller species, common in India. There are several others.

Megadermatidae (meg-a-dēr-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Megaderma + -idae.] The Megadermatinae rated as a family.

Megadermatinae (meg-a-dēr-mat'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megaderma + -inae.] A subfamily of bats of the family Nycteridae, typified by the genus Megaderma; the megaderms.

Megaderus (me-gad'ē-rus), n. [NL. (Serville, 1834), < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + δέρμα, neck, throat.] A genus of longicornes or cerambycids having the three sternal sclerites continuous. They exhibit a strong, peculiar odor, though no odoriferous glands have been discovered. They are mostly tropical American, but M. bifasciatus occurs in Texas.

Megadont (meg-a-dont'), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + ὄντω (dōntō) = E. tooth.] Having large teeth. W. H. Flower.

Megadyne (meg-a-dīn), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see mega), + E. dynē, q. v.] A unit equal to a million dynes.

Megaerg (meg-a-ērg), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see mega), + E. erg, q. v.] A unit equal to a million ergs. Also megerg, megaleg.

Megafarad (meg-a-far-ad), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see mega), + E. farad, q. v.] In electrometry, a unit equal to a million farads.

Megalama (meg-a-lē'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + αίμα, throat (breast).] The typical genus of Megalomidae or scissor-like barbed. The species of Megalama proper are Asiatic. M. hornemannii, the crimson breasted barbed, is a common Indian one, known as the lambar or coppermouth. Also Megalama, as originally by G. R. Gray in 1830.

Megalomidae (meg-a-lē'mī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Megalama + -idae.] A family of chiefly Old World non-passerine picarian birds, formerly confused with the barbets proper or puff-birds (Bucconidae) of America; scissor-like barbed. The technical characters are: the homalagomys and antipodous musculature of the zygodactylous foot; a single caudal feather; a tufted claustrum; white plumage; a bifurcated culmen; and ten rectrices. The term is synonymous with Cypselidae. The megalomes are nearly related to the toucans and woodpeckers. They are of small to moderate size of stout form, with large heads and heavy bills furnished with long bristles, in the latter respect resembling the barbets of the family Bucconidae. The coloration is highly variegated and often brilliant. Some 20 species are described, chiefly Asiatic and African, only a few occurring in South America. The family is divided into Pogonochini, Megalominae, and Cypselinae.

Megaleme (meg-a-lēm), n. A scissor-like barbed of the genus Megalama, in a broad sense. Also megaleme, megaleme.

Megalerg (meg-a-ērg), n. [< Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great (see mega), + E. erg.] Same as megaleg.

Megalesian, Megalesian (meg-a-lē'si-an), a. [< NL. Megalesia, prop. Megalesia (< Gr. Μεγάλη, a festival in honor of the Magna Mater or Cybele), neut. pl. of Megalesis, pertaining to Megale, < Gr. Μεγάλη, 'the Great,' an epithet of the Magna Mater, fem. of μέγας (meg-a-), great; see main, nickle, much.] Of or belonging to Cybele, the Great Mother. Megalesian games, in Rome, antiq., a magnificent festival, with a stately procession, feasting, and scenic performances in the theaters, celebrated at Rome in the month of April and lasting for six days, in honor of Cybele. The image of this goddess was brought to Rome from Pessinus in Galatia, about 205 B. C., and the games were instituted then or shortly afterward, in consequence of a sibylline oracle promising continual victory to the Romans if due honors were paid to her.

Megalestete (meg-a-lēs'tē-tē), n. [< Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + αἰσθητή, one who perceives; see cathete, esthetic.] A supposed tactile organ of the chitonous. Also written megalestete. H. N. Mosley.

Megalichthys (meg-a-līk'this), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + ἰχθυς, fish.] A genus of large fossil ganoid fishes of Carboniferous age, established by Agassiz. Their remains occur in Devonian beds of Europe. By Günther the genus is referred to the family Saurichthys suborder Polypteroidei; by others to families called Saurichthys or Saurichthys. It was characterized by large, smooth, but minutely punctured, diamond-shaped scales, some of which have been found 5 inches in diameter, indicating a fish of great size. The jaws were furnished with immense bony teeth. Several species have been described from the Carboniferous strata of Scotland and England.

Megalith (meg-a-lith), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + λίθος, stone.] A great stone; specifically, a stone of great size used in constructive work or as a monument, as in ancient Cyclopean and so-called Druidic or Celtic remains.

Hundreds of our countrymen rush annually to the French megaliths. J. Ferguson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 181, note.

Megalithic (meg-a-lith'ik), a. [< megalith + -ic.] Consisting of megaliths or very large stones; as, megalithic monuments; the megalithic architecture of Egypt. The word megalithic, however, as now almost exclusively used, has reference to a peculiar class of monumental remains, of which the most essential feature is that the stones used in their construction in a vast majority of cases have nearly or quite their natural form. Hence these remains, in so far as they consist of stone, have been designated as "rude stone monuments." The stones used in them are frequently, but not always, of very large size. The megaliths are perhaps the most characteristic of the various forms of megalithic construction (see these words), but circles and avenues or alignments of standing stones, as well as tumuli or barrows of earth, either covering or inclosing dolmens and frequently surrounded by one or more rows or circles of upright stones, are almost equally common and characteristic. The region especially notable for the number and variety of its megalithic remains extends from northern Africa through France and Great Britain to Scandinavia. The most remarkable display of the various forms is in Alsace, in Brittany, in Cornwall and various districts in southwestern England and Wales, as well as in parts of Ireland and Scotland; also in northern Germany, Denmark, and southern Scandinavia. There are also great numbers of dolmens and tumuli in India, especially in the hills of Khasia, where such monuments are still being erected.

To the same primitive period of the Neolithic or rude stone life must be assigned the rudiments of architectural skill pertaining to the Megalithic Age. Everywhere we find traces, alike throughout the ruins of oldest civilization and in earliest written records, including the historical books of the Old Testament Scriptures, of the erection of the simple monolith, or unhewn pillar of stone, as a record of events, a monument of memorial, or a landmark.

But it is in Egypt that megalithic architecture is seen in its most matured stage, with all the massiveness which so aptly symbolizes barbarian power. Encyc. Brit., 11, 338.

The megalithic structures, megaliths, cromlechs, dolmens, and the like . . . have been kept up as matters of modern construction and recognized purpose among the ruder indigenous tribes of India. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, 150.

Megallantoid (meg-a-lan'toid), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + NL. allantoides, q. v.] Having a large allantoid.

Megalobatrachus (meg-a-lō-bat'rā-kus), n. [NL. (Tschudi), < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + batrachos, a frog; see batrachian.] An Asiatic genus of the family Protonotridae (or Cryptobranchiidae), having four small but well-formed feet, and no gill-slits; the giant salamanders. M. macrurus is the largest living amphibian, attaining a length of three feet or more. It is found in Japan and some parts of continental Asia.

Megalocarpon (meg-a-lō-kār'pus), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + καρπός, fruit.] Having large fruit.

Megalocephalous (meg-a-lō-sef'a-lus), a. Same as megacephalus.

What Thurnam calls median brains range in weight between 40 and 52½ ounces for men and 30 and 47½ ounces for women. All brains in size above this are called megalocephalous. Sci. Amer., N. Y., LXXI, 308.

Megalocyte (meg-a-lō-sit), n. [< Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + κύτος, a cavity; see cyte.] A large blood-corpuscle, measuring from 12 to 15 micromillimeters in diameter, found in the human blood in cases of anemia, especially of pernicious anemia.

Megalogonidium (meg-a-lō-gō-nid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + NL. gonidium.] Same as macrogonidium.

Megalograph (meg-a-lō-grāf), n. [< Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + γράφω, write.] A form of camera lucida used for microscopic drawing, or for industrial pattern-drawing, as from designs formed by the kaleidoscope. It admits of drawing directly from the microscopic or kaleidoscopic image.

Megalography (meg-a-log'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + γραφία, write.] A drawing of pictures to a large scale. Bailey, 1731.

Megalomania (meg-a-lō-mā-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, + μανία, madness; see mania.] A form of insane delusion the subjects of which imagine themselves to be very great, exalted, or powerful personages; the delusion of grandeur.

Megalonyx (me-gal'o-nīks), n. [NL. (Thomas Jefferson, 1797), so called from the great size of its claw-bones; < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + ὄνυξ, a claw.] 1. A genus of gigantic extinct Pleistocene edentate quadrupeds related to the sloths, belonging to the family Mylodonidae (sometimes, however, referred to the Megatheriidae), having the foremost tooth in each jaw large and separated from the others by a wide diastema. M. carteri is one of the best known species.—2. [l. c.] An individual or a species of this genus.

Megalops (meg-a-lō'ps), n. Same as megalops, 2. Megalophonous (meg-a-lō-fō'nus), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + φωνή, voice.] 1. Having a loud voice; vociferous; clamorous. [Rare.]—2. Of grand or imposing sound. [Rare.]

This is at once more descriptive and more megalophonous.

Note on Shelley's Peter Bell the Third, Prod.

Megalophonous (meg-a-lō-fō'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + φωνή, voice; see megalophonous.] A genus of larks, of the family Aldrovandidae, founded by G. R. Gray in 1841 upon certain African species which have naked nostrils and are colored like quails, as M. apicalis (or clausa); so called from being megalophonous. Also called Corypha.

Megalopic (meg-a-lōp'ik), a. [< Gr. μεγαλόπικος, large-eyed, < μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + ὄψ, eye; see optic.] Of Megalops.] Having large eyes; specifically, of crustaceans, having the character of a megalops.

Megalopinae (meg-a-lō-pī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megalops (Megalops) + -inae.] A subfamily of elopine fishes without pseudobranchia, and with large scales and a long anal fin, represented by the genus Megalops. They are known as tarpons (or tarpuns) and jer-fish.

Megalopine (meg-a-lō-pīn), a. and n. I. a. Of, pertaining to, or having the characters of the Megalopinae.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Megalopinae. Megalopolis (meg-a-lōp'ō-lis), n. [< Gr. μεγαλόπολις, a great city, metropolis (also the name of several cities), < μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + πόλις, city; see polis.] A chief city; a metropolis.

Paul and his wife are back in the precincts of megalopolis. M. Collins, The Ivory Gate, II, 211. (Harper's Dict.)

Megalops (meg-a-lō'ps), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (meg-a-), great, large, + ὄψ, eye; see megalopic.] 1. In ichth., a genus of elopine fishes, representing the subfamily Megalopinae of the family Elopidae, founded by Lacépède in 1803. M. albinus is a large species, known as the tarpon.—2. [l. c.] A spurious genus of decapod crustaceans, representing a stage in the development of crabs in which the eyes are enormously enlarged. The term is retained in the designation of this condition, commonly known as the "megalocephalus" stage. First called megalocephalus (W. E. Leach, 1815).

In the higher Decapoda the same frequently gives rise to a Megalocephalus with very large, stalked eyes, and the complete number of appendages, from which, by a series of molts, the adult form is produced. Stand. Nat. Hist., II, 11.

3. A genus of rove-beetles or staphylinids, containing a few small species of America and Africa. Lejean, 1833.—4. A genus of reptiles.

Megalopoda (meg'-a-lōp'-ō-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. megalo- (great, large, + pod- (foot, leg)) = E. pod-], a. A pathological condition of the eyes in which objects appear enlarged.

Megalopsyche (meg'-a-lōp'-si-ki), n. [< Gr. megalo- (greatness of soul, < μεγαλόν (great, + ψυχή (soul)) = E. psyche), a. A genus of fossil ferns established by Dawson (1871), which is related to Neuropteris by its venation, and to Metopteris by the position of the leaflets. The fronds are very large and simply pinnate. This genus (according to Lequerieux not separable from Dawsonia except by the characters of the venation) is found in the Devonian of New Brunswick, in the Subcarboniferous of West Virginia, and also in the coal measures of Illinois and Ohio.

The fragments (referred to Megalopteris) pertain to a group of forms which, at the beginning of the Carboniferous epoch, represents this family by plants as remarkable by their magnitude as by the elegance and beauty of their form. Lequerieux, Cool Flora of Pennsylvania, p. 152.

Megalornis (meg'-a-lōr'-nis), n. [NL., < Gr. megalo- (great, large, + ornis (bird)) = E. ornis], a. Same as Grus, 1. G. R. Gray, 1840.—2. A genus of huge fossil birds founded by Seeley upon a fragmentary tibia from the Eocene of Sheppey, England. It was the same specimen that had been referred to Lithornis by Huxley, the true Lithornis of Owen, 1861, being regarded as different. A species has been called M. emmanus, from its supposed relationship to the emu.

Megalosaurus (meg'-a-lō-sā-ris), n. [< NL. Megalosaurus], a. A dinosaur of the family Megalosauridae.

Megalosaurian (meg'-a-lō-sā'-ri-an), a. and n. [< NL. Megalosaurus + -ian], I. a. Having the characters of a megalosaurus. II. n. A megalosaurus.

Megalosauridae (meg'-a-lō-sā'-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Megalosaurus + -idae], a. A family of dinosaurs with biconcave vertebrae, pubes slender and united distally, and tetradactyl feet, typified by the genus Megalosaurus.

Megalosauroid (meg'-a-lō-sā'-roid), a. and n. [< NL. Megalosaurus + -oid], a. Same as Megalosaurian.

Megalosaurus (meg'-a-lō-sā-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. megalo- (great, large, + sauros (lizard)) = E. sauros], a. A genus of dinosaurian reptiles, typical of the family Megalosauridae, established by Buckland upon remains indicating a gigantic terrestrial reptile of carnivorous habits. The size has been variously estimated at from 20 to 40 and even 50 feet in length. The femur and tibia were each about 3 feet long. The remains of megalosaurs have been found in abundance in the Oolite.

Skull of Megalosaurus.

1. Megalosaurus (restored). 2. tooth. 3. part of jaw.

Megalosplenia (meg'-a-lō-splē'-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. megalo- (great, large, + splēn (spleen)) = E. spleen], a. In pathol., enlargement of the spleen.

Megalotina (meg'-a-lō-ti-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Megalotis + -ina], a. A subfamily of Cynidae, represented by the genus Megalotis, having enormously large ears, three true tubercular molars of upper jaw, and short acrotorial teeth of both jaws.

Megalotina (meg'-a-lō-tin), a. [< Gr. megalo- (great, large, + otia (ear)) = E. otia], a. Having large ears, as a fox; specifically, of or pertaining to the Megalotina.

Megalotis (meg'-a-lō-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. megalo- (great, large, + otia (ear)) = E. otia], a. The typical genus of Megalotina, founded by Illiger in 1811. M. lalandi is the large-eared fox of Africa. The genus is also named Aquidus and Otocyon.—2. A genus of African and Indian larks of the family Alaudidae, named by Swainson in 1827. See Pyrhalauda.

Megamastictora (meg'-a-mas-tik'-tō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. mega- (great, large, + mastix (whip, scourge)) = E. mastix], a. A whip, scourge. In Sollas's classification of sponges, one of two main branches of the phylum Parazoa or Spongia, characterized by the comparatively large size of the choanocytes, which are 0.005 to 0.009 millimeter in diameter; the chalk-sponges; contrasted with Micramastictora.

Megamastictoral (meg'-a-mas-tik'-tō-rā), a. [< Megamastictora + -al], a. Having large choanocytes, as a chalk-sponge; of or pertaining to the Megamastictora.

Megamys (meg'-a-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. mega- (great, large, + mys (mouse)) = E. mys], a. A genus of fossil hystricomorphic rodents from the Eocene of South America, of the family Octodontidae. D'Orbigny.

Megaphone (meg'-a-fōn), n. [< Gr. mega- (great, large, + phōnē (sound)) = E. phōnē], a. An instrument devised by Edison for assisting hearing, adapted for use by deaf persons or for the perception of ordinary sounds at great distances. It consists essentially of two large funnel-shaped receivers for collecting the sound-waves, which are conducted to the ear by flexible tubes.

Megaphyton (meg'-a-fī-ton), n. [NL. (Artis, 1825), < Gr. mega- (great, large, + phōnē (plant)) = E. phōnē], a. A fossil fern-stem found in the coal-measures of Europe and America. This fossil belongs to the trunk of a tree-fern, and is marked by large scars, which are sometimes nearly square in outline and sometimes transversely oval, and placed in opposite lateral rows. The internal disks of the scars often have horseshoe-shaped vascular impressions. This fern occasionally grew to a very considerable size, having scars three inches wide.

Megapod (meg'-a-pōd), a. and n. [< Gr. mega- (great, large, + pod- (foot, leg)) = E. pod-], a. Having large feet; specifically applied to the Megapodidae.

II. n. One of the Megapodidae.

Megapodan (meg'-a-pō-dan), a. and n. Same as megapod.

Megapode (meg'-a-pōd), n. Same as megapod. I. Noun.

Megapodidae (meg'-a-pōd'-ī-de), n. pl. [NL., < Megapodius + -idae], a. Same as Megapodidae.

Megapodidae (meg'-a-pōd'-ī-de), n. pl. [NL., < Megapodius + -idae], a. A family of peristropheous alcedonimorphous birds of the order Gallinae, typified by the genus Megapodius; the megapods or mound-birds; the jungle-fowls of Australia. They have relatively large feet, with four toes on a level, as in the American curassows or Cratogeomys, which later the megapods represent in the Australian region. They are known as mound birds from their sluggish and characteristic habit of arranging up mounds of soil and decaying vegetable substances, in which the eggs are buried and left to be hatched by the heat of the decomposing mass. The eggs are buried to the depth of several feet. The chicks hatch feathered and able to fly. The birds inhabit brush and scrub, usually by the seaside, and go sometimes in pairs, sometimes in large companies. They are about the size of common fowl and are incapable of soaring color. The family is divided into Megapodinae and Talampodinae. See these words, and Megapodidae. Usually Megapodidae.

Megapodinae (meg'-a-pō-dī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megapodus + -inae], a. A subfamily of Megapodidae contrasting with Talampodinae, containing two genera, Megapodinae and Leptopodinae; mound-birds or megapods proper.

Megapodius (meg'-a-pō-dī-us), n. [NL., < Gr. mega- (great, large, + pod- (foot, leg)) = E. pod-], a. The typical and principal genus of Megapodidae, established by Quoy and Gaimard in 1824. It contains all the Megapodinae excepting Leptopodinae—in all upward of 20 species. The Australian M. melanocephalus, figured above, is a characteristic example.

Megapoli (meg'-a-pō-lis), n. [< Gr. mega- (great, large, + polis (city)) = E. polis], a. A metropolis.

Amadavad . . . is at this present the megapoli of Cambraya. See T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 64.

Megaptera (meg'-a-pē-terā), n. [NL., < Gr. mega- (great, large, + pteron (wing)) = E. pteron], a. A genus of furrowed whalebone-whales, the humpbacks, belonging to the family Rhinopteridae, and typical of the subfamily Megapterinae, established by J. E. Gray in 1846. They have a low dorsal fin, folds of skin on the throat, free cervical vertebrae, short broad baleen plates, and very long narrow flippers with only four digits. Numerous species have been described, from all seas, such as the long-finned whale, M. longimanus.

Megapterine (meg'-a-pē-terī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megaptera + -inae], a. A subfamily of Rhinopteridae or finner-whales, typified by the genus Megaptera; the humpbacks. The low dorsal fin forms a characteristic hump on the back; the long manus has four digits composed of numerous phalanges, and the throat is pleated. The genera are three: Megaptera, Pseudocetus, and Archicetus.

Megapterine (meg'-a-pē-terī-nē), a. and n. [As Megaptera + -ine], I. a. Having long fins, as a finner-whale; belonging to the Megapterinae. II. n. A member of the Megapterinae.

Megarhynchus (meg'-a-rīng'-chus), n. [NL., < Gr. mega- (great, large, + rhynchus (snout, bill)) = E. rhynchus], a. A genus of American tyrant flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae, of which M. pitangus of Brazil is the type, characterized by an enormous bill. M. macrurus of Mexico and Central America and M. chrysomelas of Ecuador are other species. The genus was named by Thunberg in 1824, and is also called Scaphorhynchus, Platyrrhynchus, and Megadroma.

Megarhynchus pitangus, life-size.

Megarian (meg'-a-ri-an), a. [< L. Megarian, < Gr. megara (pl. Megara (supper, pl. of megaron, hall, chamber, in pl. palace, caves (cells or chapel) of Demeter; see megaron), + -ian], a. Of or belonging to Megara, a city of ancient Greece, or to Megaris, a territory between Attica and Corinth, of which it was the capital; Megarian.

Megarian school, a school of philosophy founded at Megara about 400 B. C. by Euclid, a native of that city, and a disciple of Socrates. The philosophers of this school taught that the only reality is the incorporeal essence; that the material world has no real existence; that change is inconceivable, that only the actual is possible; that the good is the only real, and that virtue is the knowledge of the good. The school made much of metaphysics, and cultivated a sort of logic of refutation, which gave it the name of the eristic or dialectical school.

Megarie (meg'-a-ri-ē), a. and n. [< L. Megarius, < Gr. megara (pl. Megara), of Megara, < megara (supper, pl. of megaron, hall, chamber, in pl. palace, caves (cells or chapel) of Demeter; see megaron), + -ia], a. Same as Megarian.

II. n. A Megarian philosopher, or a follower of the Megarian school.

Megaron (meg'-a-ron), n. [< Gr. megara (pl. Megara), a large room, a large building, a palace, < mega- (great, large, + raon (room)) = E. raon], a. Specifically, the great central hall of the Homeric house or palace. In large houses of this early time there was a megaron for the men and for the entertainment of guests, and another, more secluded, for the women of the household. The plan and disposition of such megara, with the ceremonial family hearth in the middle, have been most clearly made out by the excavations of Mycenae and Tiryns at Mycenae in the Peloponnese in 1894.

Megarhiza (meg'-a-rī-zā), n. [NL., < Gr. mega- (great, large, + rhiza (root)) = E. rhiza], a. A former genus of plants now included under Echinops. The species is a large herb, 15 to 20 millimeters long, and in the enormous development of their roots. See Echinops, bitter-root, skull-route (where skull), and man-root.

melancholly (mel'an-kol-i-ly), adv. [< melancholy + -ly.] In a melancholy manner; with melancholy. [Rare.]

On a pedestal is set the statue of this young lady, reposing herself in a curious wrought-iron chair, . . . melancholly inclining her cheek to the right hand.
Keats, Memorials of Westminster (1893), p. 67.

melancholliness (mel'an-kol-i-nēs), n. The state of being melancholy; disposition to be melancholy or gloomy.

When a boy, he [Hobbes] was playmate enough, but withal he had then a contemplative melancholliness.
Aubrey, Anecdotes, II. 60.

melancholious (mel'an-kol-i-ūs), a. [< M.L. melancolicus, melancoliosus; as melancholy + -ous.] 1. Melancholy; gloomy.

Som man is to curious
In study, or melancholious.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 30.
The melancholious, crazy crew
Of canker care.
Burns, Epistle to Major Logan.

2. Expressing melancholy or gloom.

The doctor . . . added, in a melancholious tone, . . . "There won't be above thirty to divide."
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xl.

melancholist (mel'an-kol-i-st), n. [< melancholy + -ist.] One who is affected with melancholia; a melancholic.

The melancholist was afraid to sit down for fear of being broken, supposing himself of glass.
Glennie, Essays, iv.

melancholizer (mel'an-kol-i-z), v. [< melancholy + -ize.] 1. trans. To be or become melancholy; indulge in gloomy musings.

A most incomparable delight it is to be melancholized, and build castles in the air.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 154.

II. trans. To make melancholy.

That thick cloud you are now enveloped with, of melancholized old age, and undervalued adversity.
Dr. H. More, Philon. Poems, Epils. Desl.

melancholy (mel'an-kol-i), n. and a. [*< M.E. melancolie, melancoly, melancolie; < OF. melancolie, merencolie, F. melancolie = Fr. melancolie = Sp. melancolia = Pg. melancolia = It. melancolia, melancoma, melancoma = D. melancolie = G. melancholie = Dan. Milton, P. L., xl. 486.

2. A gloomy state of mind, particularly when habitual or of considerable duration; depression of spirits arising from grief or natural disposition; dejection; sadness. Also, in technical use, melancholia.

Melancholy, that cold, dry, wretched saturnine humor, creepeth in with a lean, pale, or swartish colour, which reigneth upon solitary, careful nursing men.
Buller, quoted in More's Utopia (tr. by Robinson), (ll. 7, note).

Ce. What is his malady?
Cen. Nothing but sad and silent melancholy,
Laden with griefs and thoughts, no man knows why neither.

Fletcher, Wife for a Whore, l. 2.
Shep. Ay, truly, sir, I am mightily given to melancholy.

Mal. Oh, it's your very due humour, sir; your true melancholy breeds your perfectness with it. I am melancholy myself, divers times, sir, and then do I no more but take pen and paper presently, and overflow you half a score or a dozen of sonnets at a sitting.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, III. 1.

3. Sober thoughtfulness; pensiveness. [Rare.]

Hail, thou Goddess, sage and holy,
Hail, divinest Melancholy,
Whose salubrious visage is so bright
To hit the sense of human sight,
And therefore to our weaker view
O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom a hue.
Milton, II. Penseroso, l. 12.

4. Bitterness of feeling; ill nature.

And if that she be rich and of passage,
Thence selow it is a torment
To soften hire pride and hire malice.
Chaucer, Prologue to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 132.
Maid in his malice he meets another.
Watts, Arthur (E. E. T. 8.), l. 204.

5. Hypochondria, gloominess, despondency.

II. a. 1. Produced by melancholia or madness of any kind.

Duke Byron
Flows with adust and melancholy choler.
Chapman, Byron's Conspiracy, II. 1.

Luther's conference with the devil might be, for aught I know, nothing but a melancholy dream.
Chillingworth, Religion of Protestants, Pref.

2. Affected by depression of spirits; depressed in spirits; dejected; gloomy.

How now, sweet Frank! why art thou melancholy?
Shak., M. W. of W., II. i. 156.

3. Given to contemplation; thoughtful; pensive. See I. 3. [Rare.]

A certain music, never known before,
Here soothed the pensive melancholy mind.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, l. 40.

4. Producing or fitted to produce sadness or gloom; sad; mournful; as, a melancholy fact; a melancholy event.

Their songs are very melancholy and doleful, so is their music; but whether it be natural to the Indians to be thus melancholy, or the effect of their slavery, I am not certain.
Dampier, Voyages, I. 127.

'Tis past, that melancholy dream!
Nor will I quit thy shore.
Wordsworth, Poems of the Affections, ix.

5. Grave or gloomy in character; suggestive of melancholy; somber.

The house is modern, and seems to be the seat of some gentleman, being in a very pleasant though melancholy place.
Keats, Diary, Sept. 30, 1844.

Melancholy-thistle (mel'an-kol-i-this'tl), n. A European species of thistle, Cnicus heterophyllus, once reputed to cure melancholy.

Melanchthonian (mel-ang-kol-i-thi-on), a. and n. [< Melanchthon (see def.) + -ian.] The name Melanchthon is a translation into classical form of the G. surname Schwarzert, lit. 'black earth'; [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + γῆ (gē), earth.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Philip Melanchthon (1497-1560), the German reformer.

II. n. A follower of Melanchthon in his use of the Aristotelian philosophy and in his theological views.

The fanatical intolerance of the strict Lutheran party against the Calvinists and moderate Lutherans, called after their leader Melanchthonianism or Philippism.
P. Schaff, in Amer. Cyc., XIV. 240.

Melanconies (mel'an-ko-ni-ēs), n. pl. [NL. (Herkelley, 1860), < Melanconium + -ies.] One of the principal divisions of Fungi Imperfecti, or fungi of which the complete life-history is unknown. Many are suspected of being asexual stages of Ascomycetes. The spores come out in tendrils, or form a dark mass. Also written Melanconia.

Melanconium (mel'an-ko-ni-um), n. [NL. (Link, 1800), < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + κώνη (kōnē), a cone.] A genus of fungi, typical of the division Melanconies, in which the spores are simple, globular-oblong, brownish, oozing out in a dark mass. About 70 widely distributed species are known.

Melandrya (me-lan'dri-ä), n. [NL., so called as found chiefly under the bark of trees; [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + δρυς (drys), tree, oak; see dryad.] The typical genus of Melandryidae, founded by Fabricius in 1801. It is represented in northern Europe and North America. M. caraboides is a British species. M. stricta of Say is the only one known in the United States.

Melandryids (mel-an-dri-i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Melandrya + -ids.] A family of trachelate heteromeric beetles, typified by the genus Melandrya. The anterior coxal cavities are open behind; the head is not strongly and suddenly constricted at base; the middle coxae are not very prominent; the antennae are free; the thorax is margined at the sides; and the disk has basal impressions. They inhabit temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

Melanemia, n. See melanemia.

Melanerpes (mel-a-nēr-pēs), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + ὄρνις (ornis), bird; see ornith.] A genus of woodpeckers of the family caprim. giving name to a subfamily Melanerpeinae. M. erythrocephalus, a typical example, is the common red-headed woodpecker of the United States, steel-blue-black with white with crimson band, one of the most abundant, showy, and familiar of its tribe in most of the States. M. formicivorus is a related species of the southwestern parts of the United States, noted for its habit of storing acorns in holes which it drills in dead timber. Many others have been referred to this genus.

Melanerpes (mel'a-nēr-pēs), n. pl. [NL., < Melanerpes + -es.] A subfamily of Picidae, exemplified by the genus Melanerpes, of uncertain limits. The group includes many American woodpeckers, generally of spotted, striped, or otherwise variegated coloration, such as the species of Melanerpes and Centurus.

Melanesian (mel-a-nē'shan), a. and n. [< Melanesia (see def.), lit. 'the islands of the blacks,' < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + νῆσος (nēsos), an island.] I. a. Of or belonging to Melanesia or a race inhabiting it.

II. n. A native of Melanesia, a collection of islands in the western part of the Pacific, including New Caledonia, the Fiji Islands, Solomon Islands, New Hebrides, New Britain, etc. (some geographers include Papua and extend the term to comprise some of the lesser islands of the Malay archipelago); a member of one of the black or dark-brown races inhabiting the Melanesian islands. In race and language the Melanesians appear to have affinities with both the Papuans and the Polynesians.

Melanetta (mel-a-net'a), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + ὄρνις (ornis), bird; see ornith.] A genus of marine ducks of the family Anatidae and subfamily Fuliginae; the white-winged black scoters, surf-ducks, or sea-coots. The males are black or blackish, with a large white area on the wing and a bright partly-colored bill. The common North American species is M. melanotos or M. deglandi, very closely related to M. fusca of Europe and Asia, it really distinct. Also written Melanitta, and more correctly Melanotus.

mélange (ma-lōnz'), n. [F., a mixture, < mēler, mix; see melle, melle.] 1. A mixture; a medley; usually, an uncombined mingling or association of elements, objects, or individuals; in lit., a miscellany. - 2. A French dress-goods of cotton cloth and woolen stuff. E. H. Knight.

Melania (me-lā-ni-ä), n. [NL., < L. melania, < Gr. μέλας (melas), blackness, < μέλας (melas), black.] 1. In conch., the typical genus of fresh-water snails of the family Melaniidae and subfamily Melaninae, having a shell covered with thick and usually dark or blackish epidermis. The extent of the genus has varied much with different writers. There are about 400 species, mostly Asiatic and Polynesian.

2. In entom., (a) A genus of dipterous insects. (b) A genus of lepidopterous insects.

Melaniceae (me-lā-ni-ä-sē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Melania + -ae.] Name of a subfamily.

melaniacean (me-lā-ni-ä-sē-än), a. Of or pertaining to the Melaniceae.

melanian (me-lā-ni-än), a. and n. [< Melania + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Melanidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the family Melanidae.

melanic (me-lan'ik), a. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + -ic.] 1. Black; dark: as, a melanic race. - 2. Of or pertaining to melanosis. - Melanic cancer, melanocarcinoma or melanocarcinoma. - Melanic deposit, a deposit of dark pigment in the tissues. - Melanic variety or race, in conch., a variety or race characterized by a darker color or a greater extension of the dark markings than in others of the species. Such varieties have frequently been described as distinct species.

Melanidae (me-lā-ni-ä-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melania + -idae.] A family of gastropods of the order Franschanchiata, typified by the genus Melania. The shell is spiral, turreted, and covered with dark epidermis; the aperture is often channelled or notched in front; the outer lip is acute, and the operculum is horny and spiral. The very numerous species, referable to many genera, are mostly fluviatile and ovoviviparous. They are found in nearly all the warmer parts of the world. The family is divided, both on structural characters and on geographical distribution, into two subfamilies, Melaninae and Streptaninae. Also Melaniceae, Melanidae.

melaniliform (me-lā-ni-i-fōrm), a. [< NL. Melania + L. forma, form.] Having the form of the melanin; resembling a melanin.

Melaninae (me-lā-ni-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Melania + -inae.] One of two subfamilies of Melanidae, typified by the genus Melania, containing chiefly Asiatic and Polynesian species, only a few of which are found in America; distinguished from Streptaninae. The aperture is usually rounded in front and not produced, though often notched; the mantle-margin is fringed. The species are ovoviviparous.

melanine (me-lā-ni-in), a. and n. I. a. Melanian in a strict sense; of or pertaining to the Melaninae.

II. n. A member of the Melaninae.

Red-headed Woodpecker, Melanerpes erythrocephalus

melanin (mel'ə-nin), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + -in.] A basic substance ($C_{10}H_{12}N_2$) obtained from cyanogen chloride and dry aniline.

melanin (mel'ə-nin), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + -in.] The black pigment of the hair, choroid, retina, and epidermis of colored races; also, the dark pigment seen in melanemia and in melanocarcinoma and melanocarcinoma. The pigments in these cases may, however, be different.

We must be on our guard, however, not to confound the ordinary black pigment found in the human lungs with melanin. Frej, Histol. and Histochem. (trans.) p. 58.

melanoid (mē-lā'ni-oid), a. and n. [< Melania + -oid.] Same as melanian.

Melanipha (mel'ə-nip'ē), n. [NL. (Duponchel, 1839), < Gr. Melanipha, f., μέλανη φαις, m., a mythical proper name, < μέλας (melas), black, + φαις, phais, horse.] A genus of geometrid moths of the subfamily Larentina, of wide distribution, with over 40 species.

melanism (mel'ə-niz-m), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + -ism.] In physiol., an undue development of coloring material in the skin and its appendages: the opposite of albinism; specifically, in zool., the abnormal development of black or dark pigment in the pelage of a mammal or the plumage of a bird. It is not pathological like melanosis, interfering in no way with the health and vigor of the animal. It is very frequent in some groups, as squirrels and hawks, and sometimes becomes an inherited specific character, as in the case of the black rat, Rattus, believed to be a permanent melanism of the white-bellied rat or rat-rat, M. alexandrinus or M. tectorum. Compare albism, leucism, erythrism.

melanistic (mel'ə-nis'tik), a. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + -istic.] Affected with melanism; abnormally dark in color. Also melanistic.

The Narus vittata was based on a melanistic specimen of N. rufa, collected by the traveler Schomburgk. J. A. Allen.

melanite (mel'ə-nit), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + -ite.] 1. A variety of garnet of a deep-black color. It properly belongs to the lime iron division of the species, but some other kinds are also included. It is often associated with volcanic rocks as at Vesuvius. Some varieties are remarkable as containing a small percentage of titanium, and seem to be intermediate between garnet and schorlomite. See garnet.

2. In conch., a fossil melanian.

melanitic (mel'ə-nit'ik), a. [< melanite + -ic.] Pertaining to, resembling, or containing melanite.

melanocarcinoma (mel'ə-nō-kār-si-nō'mā), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + καρκίνωμα, cancer: see carcinoma.] In pathol., a pigmented carcinoma, from gray to brown and black in color. The pigment lies partly in the epithelial tracts, and partly in the stroma. It is less frequent than melanotic sarcoma.

Melanocetinae (mel'ə-nō-sē-ti-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Melanocetus + -inae.] A subfamily of Cetartida, represented by the genus Melanocetus.

melanocetine (mel'ə-nō-sē-tin), a. and n. I. a. Having the characters of or pertaining to the Melanocetinae.

II. n. A pediculate fish of the subfamily Melanocetinae.

Melanocetus (mel'ə-nō-sē-tus), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + κητος, a whale: see Cetacea.] A genus of deep-sea pediculate fishes, Melanocetus johnsonii, the belly distended with another fish, about half natural size.

typical of the subfamily Melanocetinae, black in color, and with a mouth suggesting that of a whale. M. johnsonii is the only species. Günther, 1864.

Melanochroa (mel'ə-nō-kro'ā), n. pl. [NL. pl. of melanochroa, black-skinned: see melanochroa.] In anthropology, the dark-white peoples, a variety of races in Melanochroa according to Huxley's classification. They are pale-complexioned people, with dark hair and eyes, and generally long, but sometimes broad skulls, as the Iberians and black Celts of western Europe, and the dark-complexioned white people of the shores of the Mediterranean, western Asia, and Persia.

I am disposed to think that the Melanochroa are not a distinct group, but result from the mixture of Australoids and Austrochroa. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 421.

Hamitic and Semitic Melanochroa W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII, 317.

melanochroic (mel'ə-nō-kro'ik), a. [< melanochroa + -ic.] Dark-colored; of or pertaining to the Melanochroa; as, the melanochroic races.

The melanochroic or dark stock of Europe. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 180.

melanochroite (mel'ə-nō-kro'it), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + χροα, chroma, color, + -ite.] A basic chromate of lead found at Berzovsk in the Ural. Also called phosphochroite, since the color is red rather than black.

melanochroous (mel'ə-nō-kro'us), a. [< NL. melanochroous, < Gr. μέλανος (melanos), black-skinned, < μέλας (melas), black, + χροα, chroma, skin, color.] Dark-colored; having an unusually dark skin, as a person of white race. Also, improperly, melanochrous.

There seems good ground for the belief that . . . among Europeans, the melanochrous people are less obnoxious to its [yellow fever's] ravages than the austrochrous. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 157.

melanocomus (mel'ə-nō-kō-mus), a. [< Gr. μέλανος (melanos), black-haired, < μέλας (melas), black, + κομη, hair: see coma.] Black-haired; having black hair.

Melanocorypha (mel'ə-nō-kōr'i-fā), n. [NL. (Bonn, 1828), < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + κορυφή, head, top: see coryphaea.] One of the leading genera of the lark family, Audubon, containing such as the common M. calandra, the calandra lark of Europe and Africa, and M. sibirica, the white-winged lark.

Melanodendron (mel'ə-nō-dēn'drōn), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1836), < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + δένδρον, a tree.] A genus of plants of the natural order Compositae, tribe Asteraceae, and subtribe Heterochromaeae. They have copious bristly pappus, numerous narrow bracts of the involucre which are arranged in an indefinite number of rows, and achenia which are 3 or 6 ribbed, and scarcely compressed. There is but a single species, M. integrifolium. See black cabbage tree, under cabbage tree.

melanoid (mel'ə-nō'id), a. [< Gr. μέλανος (melanos), black-looking, < μέλας (melas), black, + -oid, form.] Having a black or dark appearance.

Melanoid cancer, in pathol., melanocarcinoma.

Melanoma (mel'ə-nō'mā), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, < μέλανος (melanos), black.] A dark-pigmented tumor.

melanopathia (mel'ə-nō-pā-thi'ā), n. [NL. < see melanopathy.] An excess of the dark pigment of the skin, due to abnormal function of the rete mucosum. See melanosis.

melanopathy (mel'ə-nō-pā-thi), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + πάθος, suffering.] Same as melanopathia.

Melanophila (mel'ə-nō-fī-lā), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + φίλος, loving.] A genus of buprestid beetles founded by Fachscholtz. About 40 species are known, and the genus is proper to the cold and temperate regions of both hemispheres, but a few have been found in Brazil and the East Indies. Eleven occur in North America. M. fulvipes is a small brassy black species with three pairs of yellow spots, inhabiting pines in the northern United States.

melanophlogite (mel'ə-nō-flo-jit), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + φλογίς (phlogis), a flame (see phlogis), + -ite.] A mineral occurring in colorless cubic crystals, which turn black when heated; whence the name. It consists of almost pure silica and is probably a pseudomorph. It is found associated with the crystals of sulphur of Gipsdorf, Silesia.

Melanophyceae (mel'ə-nō-fī-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Rabenhorst, 1869), < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + φυκος, a seaweed, + -ae.] One of the five great divisions of Algae according to the classification of Rabenhorst. It included the Phaeophyceae and Fucales, and is the same, or nearly the same, as Melanospermae.

Melanopsidae (mel'ə-nō-pī-sī-ē), n. pl. [< Melanopsis + -idae.] An Old World family of gastropods, typified by the genus Melanopsis, related to and detached from Melammina. The spire is short and pointed, the body-whorl elongated and the full lip thickened.

Melanopsis (mel'ə-nō-pī-sis), n. [NL. < Melanopsis + -is.] 1. The typical genus of Melanopsidae. M. costata is a Syrian species, said to be found in the Dead Sea.

Melanorrhiza (mel'ə-nō-rō-zā), n. [NL. (Wallich, 1830), < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + ρίζα, a flowing, < ρέω, flow.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Androsaceae and the tribe Mangifereae, characterized by simple leaves, by the petals growing after the flower expands, and by the numerous stamens. They are large trees, over a hundred feet in height, and have broad spreading heads bearing large entire coriaceous leaves, and axillary panicles of perfect flowers. The fruit is a drupe, and is surrounded by the five or six enlarged petals, which are spread out in a star-like manner. There are 4 species, natives of eastern India and Borneo. M. uatata is the important black, Marjahan or Bismess variety tree.

melanosarcoma (mel'ə-nō-sār-kō'mā), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + σάρκωμα, sarcoma.] In pathol., a form of sarcoma characterized by the presence of dark pigment. It most frequently occurs in the skin and choroid coat of the eye, is usually formed of spindle-shaped cells, and is very malignant.

melanoscope (mel'ə-nō-skōp), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + σκοπεω, view.] An instrument devised by Lommel to distinguish between the flames of substances which in the spectroscopic exhibit red bands. It consists of a pair of spectacles made of glass of light-violet color over dark-red glass, a combination which admits only red rays, so that most greens, for example, would appear black.

melanosis (mel'ə-nō-sis), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλανος (melanos), becoming black: see melanosis.] A fungous disease of grape-vines, caused by Septoria ampelina. The leaves are the parts attacked, and are at first covered with brownish spots; these soon spread over and discolor the entire surface of the leaf, which then drops off. The fungus is probably a native of Europe, but also occurs in New York along the lakes, in Kansas, and in Missouri. See Septoria.

melanosiderite (mel'ə-nō-sīd'it), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + σίδηρος, iron: see siderite.] A mineral occurring in black masses with a vitreous or resinous luster. It consists of hydrated iron sesquioxide with 7 per cent. of silica. It is found at Mineral Hill, Delaware county, Pennsylvania.

melanosis (mel'ə-nō'sis), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), becoming black, < μέλανος (melanos), blacken: see melanoma.] In pathol., (a) An abnormal deposition of pigmentary matter in various organs or parts of the body, as the spleen, liver, or bone marrow, associated with melanemia, malarial poisoning, etc. (b) The condition of the system associated with the presence of pigmented tumors. Specifically, this is an organic adhesion (due to the softening of the tissue of the part from a pigmentary deposit, especially tubercles) in which tissue is converted into a black, hard, homogeneous substance, near which ulcers or cavities may form.

melanosperm (mel'ə-nō-spēr-m), n. An alga belonging to the division Melanospermae.

Melanospermae (mel'ə-nō-spēr'mā-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Harvey, 1849), < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + σπέρμα, seed, + -ae.] The olive-brown seaweeds, one of the three principal divisions into which the Algae were divided by Harvey. It included the Fucales, Laminariaceae, etc., but is now nearly obsolete.

melanospermous (mel'ə-nō-spēr'mus), a. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + σπέρμα, seed, + -ous.] Characterized by dark-colored seeds or spores; belonging to the Melanospermae.

The group of melanospermous or olive-green seaweeds. W. H. Carpenter, Micro., 1 667.

melanotekite (mel'ə-nō-tē-kīt), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + τέκτων, melt, + -ite.] A rare silicate of lead and iron from Langban, Sweden. It occurs in black or blackish gray crystalline masses with cleavage in two directions. It fuses easily to a black glass, whence the name.

melanothallite (mel'ə-nō-thāl'it), n. [< Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + θάλλω, to branch, + -ite.] In mineral., a mineral occurring in black lamellae, which upon exposure gradually change to a green color, and containing copper chloride, copper oxide, and water. It was found as a sublimation-product at Vesuvius.

melanotic (mel'ə-nō'tik), a. [< melanosis (-osis) + -ic.] 1. Properly, affected with melanosis; melanotic; melanoid. 2. In zool., same as melanistic. Melanotic cancer, melanocarcinoma or melanocarcinoma.

Melanotus (mel'ə-nō'tus), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλας (melas), black, + νοτος, the back.] A genus of click-beetles of the family Elateridae, founded by Fachscholtz in 1829. It is one of the largest and most important genera of Elateridae, and is distributed all over the world. There are upward of 100 species, 44 of which are North American. These beetles give rise to some of the most destructive wire worms. M. comatus is a common brown pilose species of the United States, half an inch long.

melanotype (mel'a no-tip), n. [Gr. melas (melas-), black, + typos, type.] In photog., a ferrotype. [Rare or obsolete.]

melanous (mel'as-us), a. [Gr. melas (melas-), black, + ous.] Dark-complexioned; brunette; the opposite of blond or rathous. Pritchard

The melanous, with black hair and dark brown or blackish skin. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 152.

Melanoxylon (mel-a-nok'si-lon), n. [NL. (Schott, 1837), Gr. melas (melas-), black, + xylon, wood.] A genus of leguminous plants of the suborder Casipinae and the tribe Serapionaceae, characterized by a compressed partially woody legume with kamara-like seeds, the outer integument expanding into a wing at the apex. There is but one species, M. brachyloba. See brachyloba.

melanterite (mel-an'te-rit), n. [Gr. melas (melas-), black, + ter.] The native hydrous sulphate of iron.

Melanthium (mel-an'thi-um), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called in allusion to the darker color which the persistent perianth assumes after blossoming; Gr. melas (melas-), black, + anthos, a flower.] A genus of liliaceous plants of the tribe Veratreae. They have flat broadly winged seeds, and the segments of the perianth have a distinct claw. They are herbs having an erect leafy stem springing from a short rootstock, and an open pyramidal panicle of polyanthus flowers, which are yellowish white or greenish. There are 3 species, all natives of North America, and sometimes cultivated for ornament. M. virginicum of the United States is called black flower (which see).

melanuria (mel-a-nu'ri-a), n. [NL.; see melan-.] The presence of a dark pigment in the urine.

melanuric (mel-a-nu'rik), a. [As melanuric + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by the presence of very dark pigment in the urine.—Melanuric fever. See fever.

melanurin (mel-a-nu'rin), n. [Gr. melas (melas-), black, + urine.] A dark pigment found in the urine.

melaphyre (mel-a'fir), n. [Gr. melas (melas-), black, + phyr (phyr-), porphyry; see porphyry.] A fine-grained greenish or brownish-black aggregate of plagioclase, augite, olivine, magnetite, or titaniferous iron and some chloritic mineral, usually dolomite. The term melaphyre, as it has been formerly used by lithologists, includes a considerable variety of rocks, but is now generally restricted to it. It is properly applied to such basalt as have undergone considerable alteration. Hence the melaphyres are, in point of fact, mostly of Paleozoic age, although some are Mesozoic, because the older a rock is, other things being equal, the more likely it is to have undergone chemical change.

mela-rosa, molla-rosa (mel-a-ro'za), n. [It. mela, an apple, + rosa, a rose.] The fruit of a tree of the genus Citrus, probably a variety of the lime, cultivated in Italy.

melasma (me-las'ma), n. [NL.; Gr. melas (melas-), black color, + asma, blacken, Gr. melas (melas-), black; see melas.] 1. An abnormal excess of color of the skin, local or general, usually dependent upon constitutional disorder; local pigmentary stains of the skin. The morbid process is called melanopathia. Addison's disease is known as suprarenal melasma.—2. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) A genus of melianian mollusks. Adams, 1858. (b) A genus of tenebrionine beetles, based on M. lineatum of the Canaries. Wollaston, 1844.

melasmic (me-las'mik), a. and n. [Gr. melasma + -ic.] 1. a. Pertaining to melasma; as, melasmic blotches.

2. n. Same as melasma, 1.

melassest, n. An obsolete form of molasses.

melassic (me-las'ik), a. [Gr. melas (melas-), black, + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from molasses; as, melassic acid.

Melastomaceae (me-las'to-ma'se-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Burmann, 1737), so called because the fruit of some species, when eaten, stains the lips black; Gr. melas (melas-), black, + stoma, mouth.] An Old World genus of plants, type of the natural order Melastomaceae, belonging to the tribe Osbeckieae. They have from 10 to 14 unequal anthers, the connectives of the longer ones being produced anteriorly into two tubercles or spurs. They are hairy shrubs, at most always erect, with coriaceous entire leaves which are from 3 to 7-nerved, and showy purple or rose-colored flowers growing at the tips of the branches, either solitary or in clusters. About 41 species are known, natives of tropical and western Asia, Oceania, and the Seychelles. M. Malabaricum, a shrub common in India, is there known as Indian chalcidanthus. It is also called Melabar laurel or gamberry.

Melastomaceae (me-las'to-ma'se-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Brown, 1816), Gr. melasma + -aceae.] A natural order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the cohort Myrtales. The ovules are attached to the interior angle of the cells, or to basal placentas; the anther usually opens at the top by two pores; the connective is thickened or variously appendaged; and the leaves have from 3 to 7 nerves. The order embraces 138 genera and about 2,500 species, which are almost entirely confined to the tropics, and are most abundant in South America.

melastomaceous (me-las'to-ma'she-us), a. Belonging or relating to the natural order Melastomaceae.

Melastomes (mel-a-sto'me-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Benthum and Hooker, 1847), Gr. melasma + -es.] A suborder of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the order Melastomaceae. The cells have rather prominent placentas inserted in their internal angles, and many ovules; the embryo is very small, and slightly rounded or subglobose. The suborder embraces 9 tribes and 128 genera, of which Melastoma is the type. They are trees, or rarely herbs, and are found in both the Old and New Worlds.

Melchite (mel'kit), n. and a. [McGr. M. Z. x. x. x.; Gr. Syriac melchite, Ar. melchite, melchite, lit. royal, Ch. melch, king.] 1. n. An orthodox Eastern Christian as distinguished from a Monophysite or Nestorian. The name was originally given to the Orthodox as belonging to the imperial church, the title of king being that which was commonly given in Greek and in Oriental languages to the Roman and to the Byzantine emperor. Although the term Melchite is older than the Council of Chalcedon (451), its wider use dates from its adoption after that council by the Monophysites, who rejected the decrees of the council, and employed this name to represent the Orthodox as recognizing them merely in submission to the edict of the emperor Marcian. The name Melchite is sometimes given also to members of communities of Christians in Syria and Egypt, formerly in communion with the Orthodox Greek Church, who have submitted to the Roman see.

Those Syrian Christians who, though not Greeks, followed the doctrine of the Greek Church as declared at the Council of Chalcedon, were called by their opponents, by way of reproach, Melchites, 'royalists' or 'imperialists', because they submitted to the edict of Marcian in favour of the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, l. 201.

2. a. Of or pertaining to the Melchites; as, the uncial Melchite alphabet. Isaac Taylor.

melder (mel'der), n. [Teut. melder, flour or corn in the mill, mdla, grind; see meal.] The quantity of meal sent to a mill to be ground at one time. [Scotch]

That dika melder wi the miller

Thou sat na lang as thou had allor

Burns, Tam o' Shanter

meldometer (mel-dom'e-ter), n. [Irreg. Gr. melas (melas-), melt, + metron, measure.] An apparatus devised by Joly for determining the melting-points of minerals. It involves the use of a platinum strip heated to the required degree by the passage of an electrical current whose temperature is calculated by the ordinary methods.

Meleagridæ, Meleagrididæ (mel-a-gr'i-dæ), n. pl. [NL.; Gr. melas (melas-), black, + agris, a hawk.] A family of Gallinæ or gallinaceous birds; the turkeys. The name is sometimes restricted to the American turkeys, and sometimes includes the African guinea-fowls.

Meleagridina, Meleagrinnæ (mel-a-gr'i-dinæ), n. pl. [NL.; Gr. melas (melas-), black, + agris, a hawk.] An American subfamily of Phasianidæ, typified by the genus Meleagris.

Meleagrinnæ (mel-a-gr'i-næ), n. [NL.; Gr. melas (melas-), black, + agris, a hawk.] A genus of asipionate bivalves of the family Pteridæ or Pteridæ, the wing-shells, having the wings reduced and no cardinal teeth; the true pearl-oysters. The pearl-oyster is M. margaritifera, a species widely distributed in most parts of the world, in warm seas; it sometimes attains a length of 10 or 12 inches.

Meleagris (mel-a'gr'is), n. [NL.; Gr. melas (melas-), black, + agris, a hawk, a sort of guinea-fowl, named after Meleager, Gr. Meleagros, > L. Meleager, son of Ceneus, and the hero of the hunt of the Calydonian boar.] 1. In ornith.: (a) [L. c.] A name of the common guinea-fowl, to which Linnaeus gave the technical specific name Namada meleagris. (b) An American genus of Phasianidæ or Meleagrinnæ, of large size with varied metallic plumage, naked tarsi spurred in the male, bare head with erectile fleshy caruncles, and a tuft of hair-like feathers on the breast; the turkeys. There are three kinds: M. gallopavo or mezzana, the supposed original of the domestic turkey, differing little from M. gallopavo or mezzana, the common wild turkey of the United States; and the more beautiful and very distinct ocellated turkey of Honduras, M. ocellata. See turkey.

2. In conch., a genus of mollusks: same as Meleagrina. Montfort, 1810.

Mêlée (ma-lâ'), n. [F.; OF. mestre, medles, etc., a mixture, confusion, fight, > E. mêlée and metley, q. v.] A confused conflict, as a hand-to-hand fight among a number of persons; especially, in modern books, a tourney in which many combatants (not two only) take part.

"I shall tilt to-morrow," answered Athelstane, "in the mêlée; it is not worth while for me to arm myself to-day."

Scott, Ivanhoe, lii.

melegueta pepper. Same as grains of paradise (which see, under grain).

Meles (mô'lez), n. [NL.; L. melas, also males, melis, malis, a badger or martin.] The typical genus of the subfamily Melinae, family Mustelidæ. It formerly included all the Melinae, but is now restricted to the European badger, M. vulgaris or M. taxus. See Meles, and cut under badger.

Meletian (me-lé'shan), n. [Gr. Meletianus, pl. Meletianoi, L.L. Meletiani; see def.] 1. One of a sect of the fourth and fifth centuries, followers of Meletius, schismatic bishop of Lycopolis in Egypt. After his death they adopted Arian views. 2. A follower of Meletius, made bishop of Antioch about A. D. 300. He was supposed to be an Arian, but proceeded immediately to profess the Nicene faith, and the Arians appointed another bishop in his stead. Among the orthodox some were adherents of Meletius, and therefore known as Meletians; others remained separate, and were known from the last canonically ordained bishop, Eustathius, then dead as Eustathians. Further difficulty was occasioned by the two orthodox parties using the word hypodidaxis (which see) in different senses. The schism between them continued till the end of the century.

mele-tidet, n. See meal-tide.

Melia (mô'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus), so called from the resemblance of the leaves to those of the ash, Gr. aspa, the ash.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Meliaceae and the tribe Meliæ, characterized by pinnate leaves, an elongated stamens, and from 10 to 12 anthers. They are trees, with alternate pinnate or bipinnate leaves, and large axillary panicles of medium-sized flowers, which are white or purple, and are either 5- or 6-parted. There are 12 species, found in eastern India, Australia, and Oceania. M. azadirach, variously known as pride-of-India, lead tree, Indian quercus, etc., is native in sub-Himalayan India, Persia, and China, and widely cultivated for ornament in warm countries. It is from 30 to 40 feet high, and has bipinnate leaves, and large clusters of fragrant lilac-colored blossoms, whence it is sometimes called Indian lilac. Its wood, hard and finely marked, is sometimes called Indian ebony. A decoction of its bark is cathartic and emetic, and sometimes used also as a vermifuge. (See cardinalis lead tree.)

Melastoma (mē-las'tō-mā), n. Also called all-mor-gue. A long known as M. Indica, but now known as M. Indica, is the margin or rim-tree, common in India, often planted there and elsewhere. (See margin.) M. Indica, var. Indica, is an elegant tree of India, the Malayan archipelago, and Australia, called in the last-named country white cedar. M. ampereana, now considered to be the same as M. Indica, has been called ampere in the West Indies.

Melastomaceae (mē-las'tō-mā-sē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1817) < Melia + -aceae.] A natural order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the cohort Geraniales. The calyx is small, the stamens are almost always monadelphous, and the anthers are sessile on the tube or (usually) stalked. The order includes 37 genera and about 550 species, found throughout the warmer but rare in the temperate regions of the globe.

melastomaceous (mē-las'tō-mā-sē), a. Belonging to or resembling the Melastomaceae. Also melastomaceous.

Mellad (mē-lī-ad), n. [Gr. μύλας, nymphs of fruit-trees (or of flocks), < μήλας, an apple or any tree-fruit (or μήλας, a sheep or goat).] In Gr. myth., a nymph of fruit-trees or of flocks.

And from the grove
The Mellads, who bear for lack of flocks Must tend the fruit.

R. H. Stoddard, The Search for Persephone.

Melanthaceae (mē-lan-thā-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1888) < Melanthus + -aceae.] A small order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the cohort Sapindales, characterized by irregular polygamodiceous flowers, stamens which are inserted at the base of the disk, albuminous seeds, and alternate stipulate leaves. Melanthus is the type genus.

Melanthus (mē-lan-thus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700) < Gr. μήλας, honey, + άνθος, a flower.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, type of the order Melanthaceae, characterized by a calyx which is very oblique at the base, and by having from two to four ovules in each cell. They are shrubs with alternate odd pinnate leaves (the leaflets one-sided and decurrent on the stalk), and bear terminal or axillary racemes of curious irregular flowers, the lower ones sometimes imperfect. There are 6 species, natives of the Cape of Good Hope, one of which has been introduced into the Himalayas. The common name is (Cape) honey-flower, or honey plant, the blossoms abounding in honey.

Melibeian, Melibeian (mē-lī-bē-an), a. [L. Melibeia, name of a shepherd in Virgil's first eclogue (a dialogue), < Gr. Μελίβειος, cf. fem. Μελίβεια, a personal name.] In rhet. and poetry, alternate; alternately responsive; alternating; ambiean.

melic (mē-līk), a. [Gr. μελικός, pertaining to song, < μήλας, a song, strain, melody.] Pertaining to song; intended to be sung; applied especially to the more elaborate form of Greek lyric poetry, as distinguished from iambic and elegiac poetry.

The exact relation of melic poetry to the cantonal dialect.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 234.

Melica (mē-lī-kā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737) < It. melica, the great millet, < L. mel, honey.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Festuceae, type of the subtribe Meliceae. The upper glumes are empty, and the spikelets are often quite large and erect or spreading. They are erect perennial plants, often tall, with usually slender panicles, and flat or convolute leaves. About 20 species are known, having a wide range over the globe, but mostly natives of temperate climates. They are handsome grasses, but of no great agricultural value, though some serve the purpose of pasture. Melica is a general name for the species.

Meliceae (mē-lī-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883) < Melica + -eae.] A subtribe of grasses of the tribe Festuceae. It includes 4 genera of which Melica is the type, and about 20 species.

meliceris (mē-lī-sē-ris), n. [NL. < L. meliceris, < Gr. μέλι-σπέρς, a tumor so called, < μέλι, honey, + σπέρς, wax.] In pathol., an encysted tumor containing matter like honey in color and consistency, usually a hygroma.

melicerous (mē-lī-sē-rus), a. [Gr. μέλι-σπέρς, < μέλι, honey, + σπέρς, wax.] Of the nature of meliceris; affected with meliceris; as, a melicerous tumor.

a. Flowering plant of Melogramma (Melica melica). b. The panicle. c. A spikelet. d. The empty glume. e. A flowering glume, side view. f. The same, back view.

melic-grass (mē-līk-grās), n. Any grass of the genus Melica.

Melicoeca (mē-lī-kō-kā), n. [NL. (Jacquin, 1763) < Gr. μέλι, honey, + αἰσάκη, a berry.] A genus of trees of the natural order Sapindaceae, type of the tribe Melicoceae. They are trees of considerable size, with alternate, abruptly pinnate leaves, and elongated, many-flowered racemes or panicles of small whitish flowers. See honeyberry.

Melicoceae (mē-lī-kō-kā-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Radikof, 1887) < Melicoeca + -eae.] A tribe of the natural order Sapindaceae, the honeyberry family. It embraces 9 genera, Melicoeca being the type, and 45 species, found principally in the tropics.

melicottont, n. Same as melicoton.

Melidae (mē-lī-dā), n. pl. [NL. < Melae + -idae.] A family of areoid carnivorous mammals, composed of the badgers, rats, and skunks, corresponding to the three subfamilies Melina, Mellicorina, and Mephitis of the family Mustelidae. See these words.

Melieae (mē-lī-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Adr. Jussieu, 1830) < Melia + -eae.] A tribe of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Melastomaceae. The cells of the ovary contain two ovules, and the seeds have a fleshy albumen and plano convex or foliaceous cotyledons. Melia is the type genus.

Melicerax (mē-lī-sē-raks), n. [NL. < Gr. μέλι-ραξ, a hawk.] A genus of African diurnal birds of prey of the family Falconidae.

Chantrel Hawk (Melicerax melanotos)

founded by G. R. Gray in 1840; the chanting hawks. There are several species, the best-known of which are M. melanotos, M. melanotos of South Africa and M. melanotos.

Melifera, meliferous. See Melifera, meliferous.

Meligethes (mē-lī-jē-thēs), n. [NL. < Gr. μελιγέτης, Doric μέλιγας, honey-sweet, < μέλι, honey, + γέτης, rejoice.] A genus of pentamerous beetles of the family Nitidulidae. There are over 100 species, mostly of Europe, where they are sometimes called plow beetles; they feed on various flowers, eating the pollen and transmitting germs. In this way M. meligethes can be very troublesome.

melilite, melillite (mē-lī-lī-tē), n. [Prop. melilite, < Gr. μέλι, honey, + λίθος, stone.] A mineral of a yellow or grayish yellow, found at Tivoli and Capri di Bene, near Rome. It occurs in very minute tetragonal crystals in the flowers and cavities of lava, also as an essential constituent of certain kinds of basalt. It is a silicate of aluminum, magnesium, and calcium.

melilot (mē-lī-lot), n. [Gr. μέλιλον, melilot, melilot, melilot, melilot = Sp. Fig. melilot = It. melilot, melilot, < L. melilotus, < Gr. μέλιλον or μέλιλον, a kind of clover, < μέλι, honey, + λότος, lotus; see lotus.] A plant of the genus Melilotus.

Melilotus (mē-lī-lō-tus), n. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789) < see melilot.] A genus of plants of the natural order Leguminosae, the pulse family, the suborder Papilionaceae, and the tribe Trifoliceae; the clover. It is distinguished by a small, fleshy, subglobose or obovate legume, which is indehiscent or at length two-valved. The plants are herbs, with pinnately trifoliate leaves having acute stipules, and small white or yellow flowers, growing in loose racemes. About 15 species are known, which are found in the temperate and subtropical regions of the northern hemisphere. When dried, they have the peculiar fragrance of the clover leaves or the velvet grass, owing to the presence of the principle called coumarin (which see). General names for the genus are melilot and sweet clover. M. alba, the white melilot or honey lotus, also called abund clover, is an excellent bee-plant, but of little value as forage, and in some places a troublesome weed. M. officinalis, the common or yellow melilot, is the best, widely spread over Europe and Asia, and naturalized in America. It was formerly of medicinal repute, sold by the herbalists as galium flowers, but has disappeared from scientific medicine. See heart's clover and ring-clover.

Melina (mē-lī-nā), n. pl. [NL. < Melae + -inae.] A subfamily of Mustelidae, typified by the genus Melae; the badgers. The form is stout and squat; the habits are terrestrial and fossorial. There are four leading forms of Melina: the European Melae, the Asiatic Arctomys and Mydas, and the American Taxidea. Also Melina.

meline (mē-līn), a. and n. [L. melae, a badger (see Melae), + -ina.] I. a. Badger-like; of or pertaining to the Melina.

II. n. A badger of any kind; any member of the Melina.

meling, n. [Verbal n. of melis, v.] Talk; conversation.

William to the window with all misty all Melins with him may do in meling there sets.
William of Paterno (R. E. T. A. I. 768) melinite (mē-lī-nī-tē), n. An explosive of French invention, said to be composed of picric acid, gun-cotton, and gum arabic. It has been successfully used in charging shells, and its explosive force has been variously represented as from three to eleven times that of gunpowder, the smaller figure being the most probable. (Recent.)

melinophane (mē-lī-nō-fān), n. [Prop. melinophane*, < Gr. μέλι, honey, + φανος, appearing, clear, < φανος, appear.] In mineral., a silicate of beryllium, calcium, and sodium, occurring in honey yellow or sulphur-yellow plates in the zircon syenite of Norway. The name is changed, in Dana's system, to meliphanite (meliphanite).

meliorate (mē-lī-yō-rāt), v. [pret. and pp. meliorated, pp. meliorating.] [L. melioratus, pp. of meliorare (> It. meliorare, meliorare = Fr. meliorer = Sp. mejorar = OF. meliorer, meliorer), make better, < melior, better (compar. of bonus, good), = Gr. μείζων, adv., rather, compar. of μᾶλλον, adv., very much.] I. trans. To make better; improve; ameliorate.

Grace does not give us new faculties and create another nature, but meliorates and improves our own.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), II. 208.

Tragedy . . . was found the most pleasing vehicle of conveying moral truths, of meliorating the heart, and extending the interests of humanity.

Goldsmith, Origin of Poetry.

II. intrans. To grow better; be improved.

Yesterday not a bird peeped, the world was barren, peaked and pinched to-day 'tis incomparably populous; creation swarms and meliorates.

Emerson, Works and Days.

meliorator (mē-lī-yō-rā-tōr), n. Same as meliorator.

melioration (mē-lī-yō-rā-shūn), n. [OF. melioration, < L. melioratus (us), bettering, < meliorare, make better; see meliorare.] I. The act or process of making or becoming better; improvement; amelioration.

Digging yearly about the roots of trees, which is a great means both to the acceleration and melioration of fruits, is practiced in nothing but in vines.

Lucas, Nat. Hist., § 428.

By an insight into chemistry one may be enabled to make some meliorations (I speak not of transmutations) of mineral and metallic bodies.

Baile, Works, I. 264.

2. pl. In Scots law, improvements made by a tenant upon the property which he rents, and for which he is in certain cases entitled to compensation from the landlord.

meliorator (mē-lī-yō-rā-tōr), n. One who or that which meliorates or makes better.

The greatest meliorator of the world is selfish, buck-stopping trade.

Emerson, Works and Days.

meliorism (mē-lī-yō-rī-zm), n. [L. melior, better (see meliorare), + -ism.] 1. The improvement of society by regulated practical means; opposed to the passive principle of both pessimism and optimism.

Meliorism, instead of an ethical or a dynamic principle. It implies the improvement of the social condition through cold calculation, through the adoption of indirect means. It is not content merely to alleviate present suffering, it aims to create conditions under which no suffering can exist.

L. F. Ward, System. Social, II. 494.

2. The doctrine that the world is neither the worst nor the best possible, but that it is capable of improvement; a mean between theoretical pessimism and optimism.

It may be thought, however, that, if neither optimism nor pessimism is the conclusion to which we are led, the modified doctrine of what is called Meliorism may be accepted.

W. L. Gairdner, The End of Naturalism, p. 271.

The only good reason for referring to the source of the word meliorism is that you found it useful for the doctrine of meliorism to be an unpalatable confession of it in the face of the fashionable extremes.

George Eliot, Letter to James Killy, Jan. 19, 1877.

meliorist (mē-lī-yō-rīst), n. and a. [L. melior, better, + -ista.] I. n. One who accepts the practical or the theoretical doctrine of meliorism.

I am not, however, a pessimist—I am, I trust, a rational optimist, or at least a meliorist.

Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 27.

In her general attitude toward life, George Eliot was neither optimist nor pessimist. She held to the middle term, which she invented for herself, of meliorism. She was cheered by the hope, and by the belief in gradual improvement of the mass.

Cross, Life of George Eliot, III, 360.

I don't know that I ever heard anybody use the word meliorist except myself.

George Eliot, Letter to James Sullivan, Jan. 17, 1857.

II. a. Of or pertaining to meliorism or meliorists.

If we adopt either the optimist view or the meliorist view—if we say that life on the whole brings more pleasure than pain, or that it is on the way to become such that it will yield more pleasure than pain, then those actions by which life is maintained are justified, and there results a warrant for the freedom to perform them.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 90.

Melioristic (me-lyo-ris'tik), a. [< melior + -ic.] Of or pertaining to meliorism; correlated with optimistic and pessimistic.

Too scientifically melioristic for the common herd.

The Academy, March 3, 1899, p. 148.

Meliority (me-lyor'-i-ti), n. [< NL. melioritas, < L. melior, better; see meliorate.] The state of being better; betterness. [Rare.]

Aristotle ascribeth the cause of this meliority or betterness unto the air.

Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 613.

This colour of meliority and preeminence is a sign of enervation and weakness.

Bacon, Colours of Good and Evil.

Meliphaga (me-lif'a-ga), n. [NL., also, erroneously, Meliphaga; vent. pl. of "meliphagus: see meliphagus."] The typical genus of Meliphagidae. The term has been used with great latitude and little discrimination for all the family and some other birds, but is now restricted to a single species, M. phryganea of Australia, known as the black-and-yellow honey-eater. See honey-eater.

Meliphagan (me-lif'a-gan), n. A bird of the genus Meliphaga; a honey-eater. Also, erroneously, meliphagan.

Meliphagidae (mel-i-faj'i-de), n. pl. [NL., also Meliphagae; < Meliphaga + -idae.] A family of toucanrostral oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Meliphaga, belonging to the group Cinnyrimorphi of the order Passeres; the honey-eaters or honey-suckers. They are closely related to the Neotornidae, with which they share the character of the protractile bill, and pointed tongue. The bill is of variable length and degree of bluntness, but is always curved, with a prominent culmen; the nostrils are basal, and situated in a large membranous nasal fossa, never entirely covered with feathers; and they are linear or oval in shape, with or without an operculum. The first primary (except in Zosterops and Eudynamis) is about half as long as the second. The wings, tail, and feet vary in character with the genera; the anterior toes and their claws are short, the former much united at base and the hallux is large and strong. The plumage inclines to green and yellow colors, it is never blue, and is red only in one group, the Mysomelinae. Parts of the head and neck are often bare, and variously wattled or carunculate. The family is confined to the Old World, and is especially characteristic of the Australasian and Polynesian regions, though the range of the Meliphaginae is much more extensive. The species number nearly 200, referable to about 25 genera. The family is now usually divided into 4 subfamilies: Meliphaginae, Mysomelinae, and Melithreptinae.

Meliphagidan (mel-i-faj'i-dan), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the family Meliphagidae.

II. n. A meliphagan or honey-eater.

Meliphagine (mel-i-faj'i-ne), n. pl. [Also Meliphaginae; NL., < Meliphaga + -inae.] The typical subfamily of Meliphagidae. With few exceptions, the group is characteristic of the Australasian and Polynesian regions.

Meliphagine (me-lif'a-jin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the subfamily Meliphaginae; less strictly, same as meliphagidan.

II. n. A meliphagan or honey-eater of the subfamily Meliphaginae.

Meliphagous (me-lif'a-gus), a. [Also meliphagous; < NL. "meliphagus, < Gr. meli, honey, + phagō, eat."] Feeding upon honey; mellivorous.

Meliphagite (me-lif'a-nit), n. [< Gr. meli, honey, + phagō, appearing, clear, + -ite.] See meliphagane.

Melipultu, n. [< Gr. meli, honey, + l. pellere, pp. pulsus, drive out. Cf. catapult.] A honey-extractor. Phon. Diet. Apiculture, p. 48.

Melisma (me-lis'ma), n. [NL. (> It.). < Gr. melisma, a song, < melō, sing, warble, < aōō, song.] In music: (a) A song, melody, or air, as contrasted with a recitative or declamatory passage. (b) A melodic decoration, grace, flourish, or roulade. (c) A cadenza.

Melismatic (mel-is-mat'ik), a. [< It. melismatico; as melisma + -ic.] In music: (a) Melodious. (b) Ornamented; adorned. Melismatic singing or playing, a style of vocal or instrumental performance in which a great number of ornaments as trills, mordents, runs, etc., are introduced.

Melismatic song, vocal music in which there is more than one note to a syllable: opposed to syllabic song, in which there is only one note to each syllable.

Melismatics (mel-is-mat'iks), n. [Pl. of melismatic: see -ics.] In music, the art of florid or decorated vocalization.

Melissa (me-lis'a), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < Gr. melissa, Attic melissa, a bee, < meli (melē), honey; see mell².] 1. A genus of plants of the natural order Labiata, the tribe Satureieae, and the subtribe Melisseae. It is distinguished by a calyx which is distinctly two-lipped, by an exserted corolla tube, which is recurved according to how the middle, and by the divergent anther cells. They are herbs, with dentate leaves and loose axillary clusters of white or yellowish flowers. Three or four species are known, from Europe and central and western Asia. M. officinalis, from southern Europe, is the common lemon-balm of the garden. 2. In 1801, same as Andrena.

Melissa-oil (me-lis'a-oil), n. A volatile oil obtained from balm, Melissa officinalis, which gives to the plant its aromatic, lemon-like odor.—Indian melissa-oil, a fragrant oil distilled in India from a species of Andropogon. See Andropogon and lemon-grass. Also called verbena-oil.

Melissae (me-lis'e-ae), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Melissa + -ae.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Satureieae. The calyx has almost always thirteen quite prominent nerves, the corolla is two-lipped, with the tube usually exserted, and the stamens are ascending at the base and divergent above. It embraces 14 genera, Melissa being the type, and about 200 species. They are usually strong-scented aromatic herbs. The genus Isodon, the American pennyroyal, belongs to this subtribe.

Melissyl (me-lis'il), n. [< Gr. melissa, a bee, + -yl, matter.] A hypothetical radical (C₁₀H₁₀) which occurs in many compounds derived from wax. The more difficultly soluble part of beeswax consists of melissyl palmitate. Also called myricyl.

Melissuga, Melissuga, etc. See Melissuga, etc.

Melitaea (mel-i-te'a), n. [NL., < Gr. meli (r-), honey.] 1. In entom., a genus of nymphalid butterflies allied to Argynnis, containing about 50 species, chiefly European and North American, checkered with brown, yellow, and white, and not silvered on the under side, which has bands of white and yellow. M. phæton is a common and characteristic species of North America. M. Itea is a species found in the western United States. The British species, like those of Argynnis, are known to English collectors as Isodorus. 2. A genus of alcyonarians or sea-fans of the family Isodidae, or giving name to a family Melitaeidae. The polypary is branched as in the gorgonians or true sea fans and composed of alternating hard and soft or calcareous and corallaceous joints, the latter much larger than the former, which form bead-like nodes along the stem. M. ochracea is a yellowish coral from the Indian and Pacific oceans. Also Melitaea, Melitana, Melithea, Melitae.

Melitaeidae (mel-i-te'a-de), n. pl. [NL., < Melitaea + -idae.] A family of isidaceous alcyonarian corals, typified by the genus Melitaea, having porous or corky nodes. Also Melitaeidae.

Melitania (mel-i-ta'ni-a), n. [NL., irreg. for "melithamie, < Gr. meli (r-), honey, + aipa, blood."] In pathol., the presence of an abnormal quantity of sugar in the blood.

Melitophili (mel-i-tof'i-li), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. meli (r-), honey, + phōō, loving.] In Latreille's system, the sixth and last section of Scorabidae, composed of the old genera Trichius, Goliathus, and Cetonia. It corresponds more or less exactly with the modern family Cetoniidae. Also, erroneously, Melitophili.

Melitophiline (mel-i-tof'i-lin), a. Pertaining to the Melitophili, or having their characters; cetonian. Also melitophiline.

Melittose (mel-i-toe), n. [< Gr. meli (r-), honey, + -ose.] A sugar (C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁) obtained from the manna which falls in opaque drops from various species of Eucalyptus growing in Tasmania. It is a crystalline solid, dextro-rotatory, and directly fermentable. It is probably a compound of raffinose and sucrose.

Melitta (me-lit'a), n. Same as Andrena.

Melittes (me-lit'es), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Melitis + -es.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeae, characterized by a broad calyx and a much-exserted corolla-tube, with the posterior lip broad and somewhat concave. It embraces 6 genera, Melittis being the type, and 8 species, found principally in the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

Melittis (me-lit'is), n. [NL. (Linnaeus), < Gr. melissa, Attic form of melissa, a bee; see Melissa.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachy, a type of the subtribe Melittae, characterized by a three-lobed calyx, by having the cells of the anther divergent, and by the flower-cluster usually consisting of six flowers. M.

melissophyllum is the only species. See Melissa, Andrena, and honey-balm.

Melitturia (mel-i-tu'ri-a), n. [NL., < Gr. meli (r-), honey, + ōipov, urine.] In pathol., glucosuria. Also, erroneously, melitturia.

Melitturic (mel-i-tu'rik), a. [Also melitturic; < melitturia + -ic.] Glucosuric.

Melivora, Melivorinae, etc. Erroneous forms of Melittora, etc.

Meliza (me-liz'a), n. [NL., prop. "melissa, < Gr. meli, honey, + -za, spelt (NL. cea, maize).] Maize or Indian corn. See the quotation from Smollett under hasty-pudding.

Melizophilus (mel-i-zof'i-lus), n. [NL., < meliza + Gr. phōō, loving.] A genus of Old World oscine passerine birds of the family Sylviidae, founded by W. E. Leach in 1816 upon the Dartford warbler, Motacilla undata of Boddaert, now called Melizophilus undatus, provincialis, or dartfordensis.

Dartford Warbler (Melizophilus undatus)

mell¹ (mel), v. [< ME. mellen, < OF. meller, melder, etc., mix; see meddle, of which mell is a contracted form.] I. trans. To mix; blend. [Obsolete or provincial.] modulations and combinations of these and similar principles. (c) The principal voice-part in a harmonic composition; usually, now, the soprano, but in older music the tenor; the cantus firmus; the air. (d) A song of clear and balanced form; an air; a tune. A melody is authentic when its compass extends about an octave upward from its key-note or final, placed when its compass extends about a half-octave above and below the key-note and final. It is diatonic when it uses only the proper tones of the scale in which it is written, chromatic when it uses other tones foreign to that scale. It is consonant or dissonant when it proceeds by single degrees, upward or downward; direct or indirect when it proceeds by steps of more than a single degree. It is syllabic when but one tone is given to each syllable of the words; staccato when more than one tone is given to a syllable. A melody may be further described as popular, national, artistic, etc.

3. A melodious or tuneful poem; a poetical composition suitable for singing.

There are, no doubt, some exquisite melodies (like the "Soprano Part") among his (Milton's) earlier poems, as could hardly fail to be the case in an age which produced or trained the authors of our best English songs.

Lowell, Among my books, 2d ser., p. 284.

Imperfect melody, a melody which does not extend throughout the mode in which it is written. Leading melody. See leading. Syn. Harmony, Rhythm, etc. See melody.

Meloid (mel'oid), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758); etym. uncertain.] The typical genus of Meloidae; the oil-beetles, usually referred to the Cantharidae or blister-beetles proper. It contains those apterous species which have the body large and distended, with the elytra short, oval, and lapping over each other at the base of the suture. When alarmed these insects emit from the joints of the legs a yellowish oily liquor. In some parts of Spain they are used instead of cantharides, or are mixed with them. The larvae are parasitic in the nests of bees, and are peculiar in undergoing two hypermetamorphoses, thus existing in three distinct larval forms. See hypermetamorphosis. The larvae attach themselves to bees, whose eggs they destroy, and live within the egg cells, being supported by the honey intended for the young bee. As we they are called bee-larvæ. It is a very large genus, of wide distribution. Fourteen species inhabit North America.

1. First or triangular larva (the shape natural size). 2. Larva of the same species, showing the head and thorax. 3. Larva of the same species, showing the head and thorax. 4. Larva of the same species, showing the head and thorax. 5. Larva of the same species, showing the head and thorax.

Melograph (mel'og'raf), n. [Gr. melos, song, melody, + graphein, write.] An electrical apparatus for recording the order and duration of the notes of a piece of music played on a piano. The depression of the keys is made to close an electric circuit, and the record is made much in the same way that a message is recorded by a Morse telegraph-instrument. The strip of paper is afterward punctured along the marks of the record and passed through another machine, which, by means of the perforation, closes the circuit of a small electromotor and works a perforator. The perforator is then made to reproduce a strip of paper stenell, which is an exact copy of the written record. The stenell may then be used in the meloscope for the reproduction of the music.

Meloid (mel'oid), n. and adj. I. n. Pertaining to the Meloidae, or having their characters.

II. n. Any member of the family Meloidae.

Meloidæ (mel'oid-ee), n. pl. [NL., Meloidæ + -idae.] A family of beetles typified by the genus Meloidæ, or merged in Cantharidae. The larvae are parasitic upon other insects, especially Hymenoptera.

Melologue (mel'og'log), n. [Gr. melos, song, + logos, speech; see logos. Cf. monologue, etc.] A mixture of speech and song; a recitative; a melodrama. [Rare.]

During a stay in Italy Berlioz composed an overture to King Lear and La Bataille de la Vie, a sort of symphony, with intervening poetical declamation between the single movements, called by the composer a melologue.

Melolontha (mel'ol-on'tha), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775), Gr. melolontha, melolontha, a kind of beetle or cockchafer.] The typical genus of Melolonthidae. It is represented in the Old World extensively, with about 20 species, having the third antennal joint longer than the fourth, the antennal club of the male 7-jointed, that of the female 6-jointed. M. vulgaris is the common cockchafer or dor-hog of Europe, often very destructive.

Melolonthidae (mel'ol-on'thi-de), n. pl. [NL., Melolontha + -idae.] A family of lamellicorn beetles, typified by the genus Melolontha; now generally reduced to a subfamily of Scarabidae; cockchafers. The same group of beetles, variously rated in the system, is called Melolonthidae, Melolonthæ, Melolonthidæ, Melolonthinæ, Melolonthinæ.

Melolonthidan (mel'ol-on'thi-dan), n. A member of the Melolonthidae.

Melolonthine (mel'ol-on'thin), n. [Gr. Melolontha + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the group of beetles typified by the genus Melolontha.

Melomane (mel'ō-man), n. [Gr. melos, song, melody, + mania, madness, frenzy.] Same as melomaniac.

Melomaniac (mel'ō-mā-ni-ak), n. [Gr. melos, song, melody, + mania, madness, frenzy.] An inordinate passion for music. Compare musicomaniac.

Melomaniac (mel'ō-mā-ni-ak), n. [Gr. melos, song, melody, + mania, madness, frenzy.] One who has an inordinate passion for music.

Melomany (mel'ō-mā-ni), n. [Gr. melos, song, melody, + mania, madness, frenzy.] Same as melomaniac.

Melon (mel'on), n. [Formerly also mellon, mil-lon, millon (the last still in dial. use); Gr. melon, mellon, millon, F. melon = Sp. melon = Pg. melão = It. melone, a melon, ML. melo(n-), for L. melopepon (n.) (Gr. melopepon), Gr. melopepon, a melon, so called as being apple-shaped, Gr. melos (L. malum), apple (including also pears, peaches, etc.), + pepon, a melon; see pepo.] 1. A herbaceous succulent trailing annual plant, Cucumis Melo, natural order Cucurbitaceæ, or its fruit, the muskmelon. The plant is not known in a wild state, but its origin was referred by De Candolle to the region of the southern Caspian. It has been cultivated from time immemorial in the hot countries of the East, the melons of Persia being specially celebrated and is now planted wherever there is sufficient summer heat to mature its fruit. The latter at its best is very rich and highly flavored. It is an ellipsoid or globular pepo, the edible part of which is the inner layer of the pericarp, the striga and watery placenta, with the seeds being rejected. The melon is grown in numerous ways, as the cantaloup, the netting, etc. In the United States this fruit, in all its forms, is known as muskmelon, cantaloup being applied indifferently to it and the watermelon, or even by preference to the latter. The melon of Numbers 13 is thought by some to have been the watermelon (see def. 2) See cantaloup and Cucumis.

Have millions at Melitene, parsnips in Lent.

Marvell, The Garden.

2. The watermelon, Citrullus vulgaris.—3. A melon-shell.—4. A hemispherical mass of blubber taken from the top of the head of the black fish, grampus, and related cetaceans; melon blubber. The melon reaches from the snout hole to the end of the nose, and from the top of the head down to the upper jaw.

The head was dissected on deck: first the melon was removed then the throat, next the under jaw, and lastly the "head skin" which is the whaleman's term for the blubber on top of the head. Fisheries of U. S. V. II, 300.

Gourd-melon, a pumpkin-like fruit, used in India for curries. See hirsutia. Hairy melon. Same as abutilum.

Sweet-scented melon, a variety of muskmelon sometimes regarded as a species, Cucumis Datensis. Also called apple-cucumber.

Melon (mel'on), n. [Abbr. of paddy-melon or paddy-melon.] Same as paddy-melon.

Melon-blubber (mel'on-blub'er), n. The melon of a cetacean. See melon, 4.

Melon-cactus (mel'on-kak'tus), n. See Melocactus.

Melon-caterpillar (mel'on-kat'er-pil-lar), n. The larva of a pyralid moth, Phaenocarpa (Eudiplosis) hyalinata. It is yellowish green, 1½ inches long, and is destructive to melons and other peep or cucurbitaceous fruits.

Melongenidae (mel'on-jen'i-de), n. pl. [NL., Melongenæ (Gr. melos, apple, + genos, kind), the typical genus, + -idae.] A family of proboscideiferous rachiognathous gastropods, typified by the genus Melongenæ. The animal has the head elongated, narrow lateral teeth with an enlarged outer cusp, and the shell more or less pyriform. Also Melongenæ as a subfamily.

Melon-hole (mel'on-hōl), n. A hole made by the pademelon or palmelon, very dangerous for horsemen: often applied to other similar holes. [Australian.]

The plain is full of deep melon holes, and the ground is rotten and undermined with rats.

A. C. Great, Bush-life in Queensland, I, 320.

Meloniform (mel'on-i-form), a. Melon-shaped.

Melon-oil (mel'on-oil), n. The oil of the melon of a cetacean. It is valuable for lubricating watches and other fine machinery, and is by some preferred to porpoise-oil.

Melon-shaped (mel'on-shap't), a. Having the form of a melon; oval with depressed lines running from end to end, the intervals between them being convex, so that a transverse section in any part has a scalloped outline. This form is found in many fruits, seeds, the eggs of insects, etc.

Melon-shell (mel'on-shell), n. The shell of a mollusk of the genus Melo.

Melon-thistle (mel'on-thist'l), n. A melon-shaped cactus, as those of the genus Melocactus.

Melon-tree (mel'on-tré), n. The papaw, Carica Papaya.

Melon-worm (mel'on-worm), n. Same as melon-caterpillar.

Melopella (mel'ō-pē-li-ē), n. [NL., Gr. melos, song, + pellos, a dove, rock-pigeon.] A genus of the family Columbidae and subfamily Zenaidurinae; the white-winged doves. They have the outer primary normal, the tail rounded, shorter than the wing, and 12 feathered; the bill slender, black, and as long as the tarsus, a large bare premaxillary space; the neck with metallic luster, a blue black articular spot, a large white mark on the wings, and the sexes alike in plumage. M. cinerea is a common dove of the southwestern parts of the United States, conspicuous by reason of the white on the wings.

Melophagus (mel'of'a-gus), n. [NL., Gr. melos, a sheep, + phagos, eat.] A genus of pupiparous parasitic insects of the dipterous family Hippoboscidae, founded by Latreille in 1802. M. ovinus, a well known wingless species, is the common sheep tick. The genus is also called Melophida and Melophaga.

Melophone (mel'ō-fon), n. [Gr. melos, a song, + phos, voice.] A kind of concertina.

Melophonic (mel'ō-fon'ik), a. [Gr. melos, song, + phos, voice, + -ic.] Pertaining to music or its performance.

Melophonist (mel'ō-fon-ist), n. [Gr. melos, song, + phos, voice, + -ist.] A singer of melodics.

Here, as in the case of the Hebrew melophonists, I would hesitate to wrong thought.

Thackeray, A Dinner in the City, III.

Melopiano (mel'ō-pi-ā-no), n. [NL., Gr. melos, song, + πiano, see piano.] A form of pianoforte, invented by Caldara in 1770, on which a sustained tone, with a chance for crescendo and diminuendo effects, is made possible through an ingenious arrangement of little hammers that strike rapidly upon the strings and thus prolong and control their vibration. The quality of the tone produced is sweet and effective.

Meloplast (mel'ō-plast), n. [Gr. melos, song, + plastos, a molder, molder, Gr. plastikos, form; see plastic.] A system of teaching the rudiments of music, invented by P. Galin in 1817, by which many of the complications of the ordinary notation are avoided at first.

Meloplasty (mel'ō-plas-ti), n. [Gr. melos, pl., the cheeks (pl. of melos, apple), + plastis, form; see plastic.] In surg., the transplantation of tissue to supply new material for the cheeks when a considerable part has been destroyed by disease or injury.

melopoeia (mel-ō-pē-yō), n. [LL., < Gr. melō-, a making of lyric poems, musical composition, < melōs, song, + poieō, make; see poet.] The art or science of constructing melodies; melodies.

Melopittacus (mel-op-it'ā-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. melōs, song, + pittakos, a parrot.] An Australian genus of small long-tailed parrots; the green parakeets. M. undulatus is one of the commonest and prettiest parrots of the avifauna, and one of the few which breed in confinement. The birds are amiable and sociable, with more melodious notes than is usual in this family.

Melospiza (mel-ō-spī-zā), n. [NL., < Gr. melōs, song, + ornis, a bird.] A genus of the finch family, Pringillidae, founded by Baird in 1858, containing a number of fully spotted and streaked species peculiar to North America; the song-sparrows. The best known is the common song-sparrow, M. melodia, which abounds in most parts of the United States and runs into several varieties in the West. M. cinerea is a much larger and otherwise distinct species found in Alaska. Two common sparrows of eastern parts of the United States and of Canada are the swamp sparrow, M. phœbea, and Lincoln's finch, M. lincolni.

Melothria (mel-ō-thrī-ā), n. [NL., (Linnaeus, 1767), < Gr. melōs, an apple (L. melōs, melon), + thra, fig-leaf, leaf.] A genus of eucalypt plants of the series Plagiosperma, and the cucumber tribe Cucurbitaceae. The male flowers are usually in racemes, the anthers subsessile, frequently with a 2-lobed connective produced from the apex, and the pistil usually on a long and slender peduncle. It embraces about 100 species, inhabiting the warmer regions of both hemispheres. They are mostly graceful vines, either climbing or prostrate, with membranous corolla pale yellow or white flowers. M. pendula, the creeping cucumber (which see, under cucumber), is the best known species.

Melotrope (mel-ō-trop), n. [< Gr. melōs, song, + trope, a turn, turning, < tropeō, turn.] A piano fitted with a mechanical device for automatically reproducing a piece of music by means of a melograph stenocell.

The melotrope is merely mechanical in its operation, and is intended, as far as possible, to imitate the motion of the fingers in playing upon the keys of the instrument. See Am. N. S., [L. X., 370.]

mel-poll, adv. Same as poll-mell.

Without any examination had to know where the fault was, (a band of men) slow mel-poll both guilty and innocent, to the number of 7,000. Hooker, Ecceles, [Polity, viii. 9.]

Melpomene (mel-pō-mē-nē), n. [L.

Statue of Melpomene, in the Louvre Museum.

< Gr. Melpomene, one of the Muses, prop. pp. fem. of melpomēnē, sing.) 1. In class. myth., originally, the Muse of song and musical harmony, looked upon later as the especial patroness of tragedy. She is generally represented as a young woman, bearing the tragic mask and often the club of Hercules, and with her head wreathed with vine leaves in token of her relation with the dramatic deity, Bacchus. 2. A planetoid, the eighteenth in order of discovery, first observed by Professor Hind at London in 1832.

melrose (mel'roz), n. [< NL. mel rose: L. mel, honey; rosa, gen. of rosa, rose.] Honey of roses, a preparation consisting of powder of red rose, clarified honey, and diluted alcohol.

What I used was a mixture of melrose with sixteen drops of the muriatic acid.

Sir W. Fothergill, on Muriatic Acid, p. 8.

melt¹ (melt), v. t.; pret. melted, pp. melted (or molted), pp. melting. [< ME. molten (pret. malt, pp. moltan), < AS. molten, molthan (pret. muelt, pp. moltan), melt = beel, melta, melt, digest; (Gr. melōs, liquidity, melt; cf. (Bulg. mludu, soft. Akn to moliti, moliti.) I. intrans. 1. To become liquid through heat; be changed from a fixed or solid to a flowing state by heat.

This Pandore that myghte melt for us and ranthe Chaucer, Troilus l. 82.

These fellows commonly will use such deceitfulness and guiles, can speak so thickly that a man would think butter should melt in their mouths.

Luttrell, Misc. Select

O, that this too too solid flesh would melt, Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew! Shaks., Hamlet, i. 2. 120.

2. To suffer dissolution or extinction; be dissipated or wasted.

All the inhabitants of Canada shall melt away. Ex. xv. 15.

My heart melted away in secret raptures Addison, Vision of Muza

They say women have tender hearts, I know not I am sure mine melts.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, v. 2.

4. To be weakened or broken; be subdued, as by fear.

As soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man. Josh. ii. 11.

5. To pass, as one thing into another, so that the point of junction is imperceptible; pass by imperceptible degrees; blend; shade.

The twilight melted into noon.

Penrose, Day Dream, The Departure.

II. trans. 1. To reduce from a solid to a fluid state by means of heat; liquify; fuse; as, to melt iron, lead, wax, or tallow; to melt tea.

When our doth melt then snow. Shaks., 1st iv. 1. 115.

Let me see some drink, too. I am almost melted with fretting. Bea. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, III. 5.

2. To melt, to make a solution of; liquify by solution; dissolve; as, to melt sugar in water.

3. Figuratively, to soften, as by a warming and kindly influence; render gentle or susceptible to kind influences, as to love, pity, or tenderness.

For pity melts the mind to love.

Druiden.

Her noble heart was melted in her breast.

Voltaire, Princess, vi.

-Syn. To meltify; subduce. Melt, dissolve, Thaw. Fuse. Two words, especially confused, though scarcely very distinct, in melt and dissolve. The former signifies to bring a substance from a solid to a liquid condition by the agency of heat alone, the latter signifies the bringing about of this result by distributing the particles of the substance apart, among the particles of another substance which is itself liquid, and this process is termed the solution of the solid substance. Thaw differs from melt in being applied only to substances whose ordinary condition is that of a liquid, and which have become solid in consequence of the abstraction of heat, and therefore return to the liquid condition as to themselves. (Thaw is not for melt.) Dissolve is much used as a synonym of either melt or thaw. Fuse is sometimes used synonymously with thaw as to thaw wires by electricity, but it is more often used of melting together as bell-metal is made by fusing copper and tin. See the definitions of these words.

melt² (melt), n. [< mel, v. t.] 1. The melting of metal; the running down of the metal in the act of fusion. 2. The charge of metals placed in a cupola or pot for melting.

17,000 pounds of ingots were made for coinage during the year. Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1866, p. 178.

3. Any substance that is melted.

The melt is then allowed to cool, and is dissolved in a large quantity of water and neutralized with hydrochloric acid.

Benedict, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 326.

melt² (melt), n. Same as *melt*².

meltable (mel'tā-bl), a. [(< *melt*¹ + -able.) Capable of being melted; fusible.

Iron . . . is the most impure of all metals, hardly meltable.

Fuller, Worthies, Sulph, II. 253. (Duffin.)

meltada (mel-tā-dā), n. [E. Ind.] A murine rodent found in Madras, Golconda melkada.

F. Gray.

melter¹ (mel'ter), n. 1. One who melts; specifically, the official in a mint who superintends the melting of gold and silver for coining.

The melter melteth in wayne, for the euell is not taken away from them. Bible of 1561, Jer. vi. 20.

Thou melter of strong minds.

Beau. and Fl., False One, ii. 2.

The entire melting requires about sixteen hours, and is carefully watched by the master melter, who urges the furnaces to their utmost intensity.

Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 302.

2. A furnace, pot, or crucible used for melting any substance; a melting-pot; as, a melter for combining the ingredients in the manufacture of sealing-wax. Workshop Receipts.

melter² (mel'ter), n. Same as melter.

melting (mel'ting), p. a. 1. Disposed to melt or soften; feeling or showing tenderness; tender; compassionate.

To kindly cowardly, and to steel with valour The melting spirits of women.

Shaks., J. C., II. 2. 120.

One whose subdued eyes, Albeit unused to the melting moon, Drop tears.

Shaks., Othello, v. 2. 260.

2. Adapted to melt or soften; affecting; moving; as, a melting speech.

As the mind is pitched, the ear is pleased With melting airs or martial. Cowper, Task, vi. 2.

melting-furnace (mel'ting-fer'nās), n. A glass-makers' furnace in which the frit for the glass is melted before it goes to the blowing-furnace. In some manufactures the glass is worked from the melting-furnace direct.

meltingly (mel'ting-ly), adv. [(< melting + -ly.)] In a melting manner; in a manner to melt or soften; by the process of melting. [Rare.]

Zelma lay upon a bank that, her tears falling into the water, one might have thought she began meltingly to be metamorphosed to the running river.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia.

meltingness (mel'ting-nēs), n. [(< melting + -ness.)] The quality of melting; capability of being softened by some warming and kindly influence. [Rare.]

Giv' me, O thou Father of compassion, such a tenderness and meltingness of heart that I may be deeply affected with all the miseries and calamities outward or inward, of my brethren. Whole Duty of Man, Collect for Charity.

melting-pan (mel'ting-pān), n. A pan, usually in the lower part of a sugar-refinery, in which raw sugar is reduced to a syrup with water aided by heat and mechanical stirring, and from which the syrup is pumped to the blow-ups in the upper part of the refinery to be treated with lime for the precipitation of albuminous and other organic impurities.

melting-point (mel'ting-pōint), n. The point or degree of temperature at which a solid body melts; the point of fusion or fusibility. See fusion.

melting-pot (mel'ting-pot), n. A crucible.

meltith (mel'tith), n. [Probably a form of meal-tide.] A meal. [Scotch.]

melton (mel'ton), n. [So called after the original manufacturer.] A stout kind of cloth for men's wear, the surface of which is without nap, and is neither pressed nor finished.

In the treatment of broad cloth, doeskins, meltons, and all nap finished cloth the milling is carried so far that the fibres become densely matted. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 601.

melungeon (mel-un-jōn), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps ult. < F. melange, a mixture; see melange.] One of a class of people living in eastern Transvaal, of peculiar appearance and uncertain origin.

They resented the appellation Melungwa, given to them by common consent by the whites, and proudly called themselves Portuguese. Antony Truveler, April 15, 1906.

Melursus (me-lér'sus), n. [NL., irreg. < L. mel, honey, + ursus, bear.] An Indian genus of Cracidae, characterized by the shaggy hide, protrusile lips, and fewer and smaller teeth than those of Crax; honey-bears or sloth-bears. M. labialis is the assai (which see). Prechidana is a synonym.

melvie (mel'vī), v. t.; pret. and pp. melvied, pp. melvying. [A dial. var. of *melt*¹, v. t., < ME. mel-

Barrow, Holy Fair.

Melyris (me-l'ris), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775): origin obscure.] The typical genus of Melyridae. These insects are ordinarily found upon flowers; they are generally of small size and very gaily colored. Most of them are natives of Africa.

member (mēm'ber), n. [Ā ME. membre, Ā OF. (and F.) membre = Sp. miembro = Pg. It. membro, Ā L. membrum, a limb, member of the body, a part, portion, or division.] 1. An integral part of an animal body having a distinct function; a vital organ; particularly, in common use, one of the limbs or extremities, as a leg, an arm, or a wing.

Where I was wont to feed you with my blood,
I'll lop a member off, and give it you.

Know ye not that your brethren are the members of Christ?

The study of the Law is no less encumbered with superfluous Members, that are like Virgil's Army, which he tells us was so crowded many of them had not Room to use their weapons.

4. A part of any aggregate or whole; one of a number of associated parts or entities; any unit or division that can be considered separately as part of a total.

The figures and the members of these Astroble.
Chaucer, Prob. 1. Astroble

They tax our policy, and call it cowardice,
Count wisdom as no member of the war.

Specifically -- (a) A person considered in relation to any aggregate of individuals to which he belongs, particularly, one who has united with or has been formally chosen as a corporate part of an association or public body of any kind, as a church or a society -- often used elliptically in England for a member of Parliament, and in the United States for a member of Congress.

There are not more useful members in a commonwealth than merchants. Addison, The Royal Exchange

He (Sir John Dalrymple) was strenuously supported by Sir James Montgomery, member for Ayrshire.

(b) A part of a discourse, or of a period or sentence, a clause, a part of a verse: (c) In arch., any subordinate part of a building, order, or composition, as a frieze, cornice, or molding: (d) In bot., either of the two parts or sides of an ovule, united by the base of equality:—(e)

It is not, and not., a component of any higher classificatory group: thus, a species is a member of a genus; a genus is a member of a family, etc. - Borough member, in the British Parliament, a member of The House of Commons representing a borough. County member, in the British MEMBERLESS (mem-ber-less), a. [(MEMBER + LESS.)] Destitute of members; simple or undivided.

- False membrane, in pathol., an unorganized mem-

ity. Also called membrane of Cuvier. Thyroid mem- brane, the fibrous membrane which connects the hyoid bone with the thyroid cartilage. Tympanic membrane, the membrane which encloses the external meatus of the ear and separates it from the middle ear. — Undulating membrane, simple membranous bands, one margin attached, the other free, exhibiting undulatory motion. Myriophyllum trist. Vibratile membrane, same as semilunar membrane. Vitelline membrane, the proper coat or wall of an ovum, inclosing the vitellus or yolk. It corresponds to the cell wall of any other cell. Also called zona pellucida, from its pellucid appearance in some cases, as in the human ovum.

membrane-bone (mem'bran-bôn), n. An ossification in membrane of any kind; a bone which has any other origin than in cartilage. The bones of the skeleton of vertebrates are for the most part performed in cartilage, which is remodeled during the process of ossification, but some, as those of the face, of the top and sides of the skull, those found in tendon and other fibrous structures, as the bone of the eyelid; heart, penis, etc., of various animals, and all dermal bones, or those of the exoskeleton, are membrane-bones.

membraneless (mem'bran-less), a. [mem-brane + -less.] Not provided with a membrane: as, a membraneless cell.

membranella (mem'bran-nel'ä), n. [pl. membranellæ (-ë).] [N.L., dim. of membrana, membrane; see membrane.] In ool., same as curvus, 2 (o).

membranous (mem'bran-ü-sü), a. [L. membranaceus, of a membrane or parchment, < membrana, membrane; see membrane.] Same as membranous.

membrane-suture (mem'bran-su'tür), n. In the hemelytrium of a heteropterous insect, the suture between the basal harder part or corium and the terminal part or membrane.

membrane-winged (mem'bran-wing'd), a. In entom., hymenopterous.

membraniferous (mem'bran-nif'ë-rus), a. [L. membrana, membrane, + ferre = F. bear.] Having or producing membrane.

membraniform (mem'bran-ni-fôr'm), a. [L. membrana, membrane, + forma, form.] Having the characteristics of a membrane; membranous in form; laminar; lamellar; fusoid.

membranocoriaceous (mem'bran-ko-ri-ä-sü), a. [L. membrana, membrane, + corium, hide, + aceus, < Gr. coriaceus.] Of a thick, tough, membranous texture or consistency, as a polydium.

membranology (mem'bran-nol'o-jî), n. [L. membrana, membrane, + Gr. logos, < logos, speak; see -ology.] The science of membranes; a treatise on membranes. [Rare.]

membranous (mem'bran-nö-sü), a. [pl. membranosi (-si).] [N.L.; see membranous.] A muscle of the thigh; the semimembranosus.

membranous (mem'bran-nö-sü), a. [= F. membranaceus, < N.L. membranaceus, < L. membrana, membrane; see membrane.] 1. Having a membrane or membranes; membraniferous. — 2. Consisting of membrane; having the texture or quality of a membrane; membranaceous. — 3. Of or pertaining in any way to membrane; resembling membrane; membraniform. — 4. In bot., having the character or appearance of membrane; thin, rather soft and pliable, and often more or less translucent, as sometimes leaves, the walls of seed-vessels, the indusia in ferns, etc. See phrases below. Membranous crop, labyrinth, etc. See the nouns. Membranous mycelium, a mycelium in which the hyphæ form a membranous layer by interweaving. See mycelium. Membranous ossification. See membranous.

membranule (mem'bran-ül), n. [= F. membranula, < L. membranula, dim. of membrana, a membrane; see membrane.] 1. A little membrane. — 2. In entom., a small triangular flap or incurved portion on the posterior part of the base of the wings, seen in certain dragon-flies.

Memnonian (mem'no-ni-an), a. [L. Memnonius, < Gr. Memnon, Memnon, of Memnon, < Memnos, L. Memnon, Memnon; see del.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling Memnon, an Oriental or Ethiopian hero in the Trojan war, slain by Achilles. He was a solar hero, son of the Dawn (Eos), or of Day (Hemera), symbolized as a youth of marvellous beauty and strength. The Greeks gave his name to one of the colossi of Ammon at Thebes in Egypt, the vocal Memnon, and called one of the temples there the Memnonium or temple of Memnon. See Memnonium.

Xerxes, the liberty of Greece to yoke.
From Susa, his Memnonian palace took,
Came to the sea.

Memnonium (mem'no-ni-um), n. [pl. Memnonia (-ä).] [Gr. Memnonion, a temple of Memnon, neut. of Memnonia, of Memnon, < Memnos, Memnon. — 1. A temple of Memnon. The name was given by the Greeks to an ancient temple at Susa in Persia, and also to the temple still so called at Thebes in Egypt, properly the Ramesseum or temple of Rameses II. See Memnonia.

And thou hast walked about (how strange a story!)
In Thebes's streets three thousand years ago,
When the Memnonium was in all its glory.

H. Smith, Address to the Mummy at Belzoni's Exhibition.

2. [L. e. or cap.] The ancient Greek name for the settlement or suburb adjoining the cemetery of an Egyptian city, consisting of extensive establishments for the commemoration of the dead, and of the dwellings of the numerous artisans employed in these establishments and in the various professions, arts, and trades connected therewith. Also memnonium.

Here stood, where the bell of the colossus is now, the Memnonion.

C. O. Muller, Manual of Archaeology, § 215.

memoir (mem'wör or mem'vör), n. [F. mé-moire, memoir, < L. memoria, memory; see memory.] 1. A note of something to be remembered; a memorandum.

He desired a Memoir of me, which I gave him, of what I would have him search for in the King's Cabinet, and promised me all the satisfaction he could give me in that affair.

Liter. Journey to Paris, p. 27.

There is not in any author's computation of the revenues of the Roman empire, and hardly any memoirs from whence it might be collected.

Archeology, Ancient China.

2. A notice or an essay relating to something within the writer's own memory or knowledge; a record of facts upon a subject personally known or investigated; a concise account of one's knowledge or information on any topic; especially, a communication to a society containing such information, as the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. — 3. pl. A narrative of the facts or events of some phase of history or in the life of a person, written from personal knowledge or observation; a history or narrative dwelling chiefly upon points about which the writer is specially informed, as an autobiography or a continuous record of observations.

Such narratives are generally limited to a special line of facts or series of events, as Guizot's Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps. 'Memoirs to serve for the history of my time.'

He told me he had studied the History of Books with the utmost application 18 years, and had brought his Mémoires into a good Method.

memorable (mem'ö-ra-b'l), a. and n. [= F. memorable = Sp. memorable = It. memorabile = L. memorabilis, worthy to be remembered or noted, remarkable. < memoria, bring to remembrance, mention; see memorate.] 1. a. 1. Worthy to be remembered; such as to be remembered; not to be forgotten; notable; remarkable; as, the memorable names of history; memorable deeds; a memorable dinner.

I passed through part of that forest, which is called Fontaine Belge forest, which is very great and memorable for exceeding abundance of great many stones.

Corpus, Credulitas, I. 34 (sig. 5).

Witness our too much memorable shame
When Cressy battle fatally was shewn.

Shak, 1 Hen. V., II. 4. 53.

Neither the praise of his wisdom or his vertue hath left him memorable to posterity.

Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

On this memorable day [that of the battle of the Boyne] he was seen wherever the peril was greatest.

Murcady, Hist. Eng., xvi.

2. Keeping in remembrance; commemorative.

I wear it (the leek) for a memorable honour;
For I am Welsh, you know, good countryman.

Shak, 1 Hen. V., IV. 7. 100.

— Syn. 1. Signal, extraordinary, famous.

II. a. An event worthy of being kept in memory; a noteworthy or remarkable thing.

memorandum (mem'ö-ran'dam), n. [pl. memoranda (-ä), less commonly memorandums (-dums).] [= F. memorandum, < L. memorandum, neut. of memorandus, to be remembered, gerundive of memorare, bring to remembrance; see memorate.] 1. Something to be remembered; used, originally as mere Latin, and usually abbreviated mem., to introduce a note of a thing to be done. Hence — 2. A note to Keep the memory: a record of something for future reference or consideration.

And over against this memorandum (of the King's own hand) "otherwise entitled."

Racon, Hist. Henry VII., p. 212.
Stings, conscious stings, have made my heart their butt,
Graving outrageous Memorandums there
Of those smokes tongues which Aphrodisias shot Into my headless breast. J. Beaumont, Psyche, II. 147.

I have never seen any work from nature of Millet's that was not memorandum-like in character, indicating by outline and shadow the principal contour.

The Century, XXXVIII. 97.

Specifically—3. In law, a writing in which the terms of a transaction or some part of them are embodied. The statute of frauds requires a note or memorandum in writing to make a valid sale in certain cases; and under this statute a letter may be a sufficient memorandum. The term is often used in the caption Memorandum of agreement, with which formal contracts are begun.

4. In diplomacy, a summary of the state of a question, or a justification of a decision agreed on. Also (as French) memoire.—Memorandum articles, in marine insurance, things referred to in the memorandum clause annexed to some policies, exempting the insurers from liability for the articles therein specified. Memorandum check, a bank check with "memorandum" or "memo" on the face of it. The legal effects of such an addition to the face of a check are that the drawer is liable upon it absolutely to the one to whom he gives it, and will not be exonerated by delay or omission to present it at the bank; and, on the other hand, it is not, like an ordinary check, a representation that the drawer has any funds in the bank. But the bank may pay it like any other check if presented. The object of a memorandum check is to serve as a formal due bill, usually with an understanding between the parties as to the desired delay in presentation for the convenience of the drawer, or that it shall never be presented at the bank, but to the drawer at a future time. Memorandum of association, in Eng. law, a document signed by shareholders, stating the name, object, etc., of a joint-stock company, upon the registration of which the company has a legal existence. It corresponds to the articles of association in the American law of corporations. Memorandum sale, the sending of goods by an intending seller to a proposing buyer, subject to the approval of the latter, the title remaining in the seller until the buyer indicates his approval or acceptance of the goods. R. Miller, Law of Conditional Sales, 2d. 2. Souvenir Memoirs, etc. See memorial.

Memorandum-book (mem-o-ran'dum-buk), n. A book in which memoranda are written; a note-book.

With memorandum book for every town.
Cowper, Prog. of Lit., I. 373.

Memorandumer (mem-o-ran'dum-er), n. One who makes memoranda; one who is given to taking notes or jotting down casual observations. [Rare.]

I feel sorry to be named or remembered by that biographical anecdotal memorandumer (Boswell) till his book of poor Dr. Johnson's life is finished and published.
Madame F. Arday, Diary, III. 335. (Davies)

Memorate (mem'o-ra-tiv), v. t. [L. memoratus, pp. of memorare (> li. memorare = Sp. Pg. memorar = OF. membrer, membrer, F. memorer), bring to remembrance, mention, recount, < memor, remembering; see memory. Cf. commemorate and remember.] To mention for remembrance; commemorate.

Memorative (mem'o-ra-tiv), a. [= F. memoratif = Sp. Pg. li. memorativo; as memorate + -ive.] 1. Of or pertaining to memory; as, the memorative faculty or power.—2. Preserving or recalling the memory of something; aiding the memory. [Archaic and rare.]

The mind doth secretly frame to itself memorative heads, whereby it recalls easily the same conceits.

Vernal weather to me most memorative.
Caroline, in Froude

Memoria (mē-mō'ri-ā), n. [pl. memoria (-ā)]. [ML. < L. memoria, memory; see memory.] 1. A shrine or reliquary containing relics of some martyr or martyrs. In primitive times it was customary to carry the memoria in religious processions.—2. A church or chapel built in memory of a martyr or confessor, often over his tomb. Cath. Dict.

Memorial (mē-mō'ri-āl), a. and n. [MF. memorial, < OF. memorial, F. mémorial = Sp. Pg. memorial = li. memorialis, < L. memorialis, of or belonging to memory or remembrance, < memoria, memory; see memory.] 1. a. 1. Preservative of memory; serving for commemoration; as, a memorial tablet; a memorial window in a church.

Those Polyonyms,
On Parnass that with thy sisters glade,
Synged with voice memorial in the shade.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 18.

Last of the are the sacred earth they spread,
And raised the tomb, memorial of the dead.
Pope, Essay, sat. 10th.

Where still the thorn's white branches wave
Memorial of his rival's grave.
Shelley, L. of L. M., IV. 34.

2. Contained in one's memory; within the memory of man; opposed to immemorial. [Rare.]

The case is with the memorial possessions of the greatest part of mankind: a few useful things mixed with many trifles fill up their memories.

Watts.

Memorial cross. See cross, 2.—Memorial day a day observed in memory of something; specifically, in the United States, same as Decoration day (which see, under decoration).—Memorial stone or tablet, a stone or tablet set up, or placed on or in a wall, to commemorate some person or event.

II. n. 1. That which preserves the memory of something; anything designed or adapted to serve as a reminder of a person, an event, or a fact or facts of any kind belonging to past time, as a record, a monument, an inscription, a custom, a periodical observance, etc.; as, the "Memorial of St. Helena," a book by Las Cases; the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford.

These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever.
Josh. IV. 7.

Memorials are history unfinished, or the first or rough draughts of history.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 120.

There is a memorial for the dead, as well in giving thanks to God for them as in praying for them.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1840), II. 201.

He lingered, poring on memorials of the world's youth Shelley, Alastor.

Nations whose memorials go back to the highest antiquity

J. Milne, in Faiths of the World.

2. In law: (a) A short note or abstract, intended for registry, exhibiting the particulars of a deed, etc. (b) In Scots law, a statement of facts bearing upon a particular point, doubtful or disputed, in order to obtain counsel's opinion upon that point; a statement of facts or points in dispute for the use or advice of counsel; a brief.

—3. A written representation of facts made to a legislative or other body as the ground of a petition, or a representation of facts accompanied with a petition.—4. In diplomacy, one of a class of informal state papers much used in negotiations, embracing such documents as circulars sent to foreign agents, answers to the communications of ambassadors, and notes to foreign cabinets and ambassadors.—5. Memory; remembrance; that which is remembered (about a person or thing).

Their memorial is perished with them

Psal. ix.

Precious is the memorial of the just Rodriguez.

6. Eccl. vi. See commemoration, 2 (b). Syn. 1.

Memorial, Monument, Memento, Souvenir, and Memorandum agree in meaning that which puts one in mind or helps one to remember; all but memorandum are especially means of keeping a record of an event, person, place, etc., in memory. A memorandum is simply a note made in order to prevent the forgetting of something important, especially something which might easily slip from the mind. Souvenir and memento differ very slightly, souvenir being a somewhat more elevated word. We give a book or a lock of hair as a memento; we prize a faded flower as a souvenir of a visit to Mount Vernon with friends now separated from us. Memorial and monument are sometimes the same as the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford is essentially a monument. A monument is often a single shaft or column, as the Washington monument; a memorial may be a commemorative structure, an illuminated window, a book, etc.

A memorial is the more affectionate, monument, the more laudatory.

C. J. Smith, Synonyms Discriminated, p. 47.

Memorialize, v. t. See memorialize.

Memorialist (mē-mō'ri-ālist), n. [MF. memorialiste = Sp. It. memorialista; as memorial + -ist.] 1. One who writes a memorial or memorials.

They would have the commemoration of their actions be transmitted by the purest and most unadorned memorialists.

Meade, Spectator, No. 180.

2. One who presents a memorial to a legislative or any other body, or to a person.

Memorialize (mē-mō'ri-ā-līz), v. t. [pret. and pp. memorialized, pp. memorializing.] [memorial + -ize.] 1. To present a memorial to; petition by memorial.

The Senate of Massachusetts refused to memorialize Congress for a female suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The American, VI. 173.

2. To commemorate.

This latter work [the Annunciation] was executed for Bernardo Cavallanti, one of the three commissioners who represented the Republic on the entrance of the Florentine army into Pisa, which event it was intended to memorialize.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 26.

memory (mem'o-ri), n. [pl. memories (-ri-ā)]. [MF. memoria, also memoria, < OF. memorie, memorie, memoria, F. mémoire = Sp. Pg. li. memoria, < L. memoria, the faculty of remembering, remembrance, memory, a historical account, < memor, mindful, remembering; cf. Gr. μνησκω, anxious, μνησκω, care, thought, μνησκω, μνησκω, remember. From L. memor are also ult. E. memorial, memorate, commemorate, remember, etc.] 1. The mental capacity of retaining unconscious traces of conscious impressions or states, and of recalling these traces to consciousness with the attendant perception that they (or their objects) have a certain relation to the past; in a narrower sense, the power of such retention alone, the power or act of recalling being termed recollection. The application of the term is often extended, with more or less figurativeness, to analogous physical processes.

The power to revive again in our minds those ideas which after imprinting have disappeared, or have been as it were laid aside out of sight, . . . is memory.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. 2. 2.

In memory there is necessarily some contrast of past and present, in retention as well as in the persistence of the old.

gladly keep within my depth.

Sir, Improving the English Tongue

Men once would not, now more than forms
Of idly memory

Lowell, Agassiz, li. 1.

3. Length of time included in the conscious experience or observation of an individual, a community, or any succession of persons; the period of time during which the acquisition of knowledge is possible.

How first this world and face of things began

And what before thy memory was time

Milton, P. L., vii. 637.

The child of Stratford upon Avon . . . whose beginning was from time when into the memory of man turn-eth not.

English Gilda (E. E. T. S.), l. 1, p. xlii.

4. The state of being remembered; continued presence in the minds or thoughts of men; retained or perpetuated knowledge; posterior

And I am told that there are women of title who hold demand memorials to be celebrated when there are no communicants: and that there are many priests who celebrate memorials in the very time and place that the ordinary ministers are celebrating the Communion.

Baker, quoted in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., xviii.

Legal memory, in Eng. law, the period since the beginning of the reign of Richard I. Sound and disposing mind and memory, the phrase used in statutes prescribing what persons may make wills and generally construed to imply ability to collect and hold in mind the particulars both of the estate to be disposed of and of the persons standing in such a relation as to have just expectations.—To commit to memory, see commit. To draw to memory, to put on record.

A noble story

And worthy to be drawn to memory

Chaucer, Prologue to Miller's Tale, l. 4.

Syn. 1-4. Memory, Recollection, Remembrance, Reminiscence. Memory is the general word for the faculty or capacity itself; recollection and remembrance are different kinds of exercise of the faculty; reminiscence also is used for the exercise of the faculty, but less commonly, and then it stands for the least energetic use of it, the matter seeming rather to be suggested to the mind. The correctness of the use of memory for that which is remembered has been disputed. The others are freely used for that which is remembered. In either sense, recollection implies more effort, more detail, and more union of objects in wholes, than remembrance. Reminiscence is used chiefly of past events, rarely of thoughts, words, or scenes, while recollection is peculiarly appropriate for the act of recalling mental operations. See remember.

measurable, that can be measured, < mensurare, measure; see mensurate, measure. [L. mensurable.] 1. Capable of being measured; measurable.

The solar month . . . is not easily measurable. Holder.

2. In music, noting that style of music which succeeded the earliest plain-song, and was distinguished from it by such a combination of simultaneous but independent voice parts that a system of rhythm was necessitated to avoid confusion. It involved both a classification of rhythms and the invention of a notation to represent rhythmic values. Two principal rhythms were recognized: tempus perfectum which was triple (called "perfect" for fanciful theological reasons), and tempus imperfectum which was double. The system of notation included notes and rests called longa, maxima, long, breve, semibreve, minim, semiminim, fusa, and semifusa (quarta), of which in general each note was equal in duration to either three or two of the next denomination, according to the tempus used (see the various words). The working out of the system was highly complicated, but it prepared the way for the medieval study of counterpoint and for the invention of an adequate notation, and thus contributed directly to the progress of musical art. Also measured.

measurableness (men'syur-ah-bliness), n. The quality of being measurable; measurability. Bailey, 1727.

mensural (men'syur-ah), a. [L. mensuralis, of or belonging to measuring, < L. mensura, measuring; see measure, n.] 1. Pertaining to measure. 2. Same as measurable. 2. -Mensural note, in musical notation, a note whose form indicates its time value relative to other notes in the same piece, as in the ordinary modern notation.

Mensural signature. See signature and rhythmic.

mensurate (men'syur-ah), v. t.: pret. and pp. mensurated, ppr. mensurating. [L. mensuratus, pp. of mensurare (> It. mensurare = Sp. Pg. mensurar = F. mesurer), mensure, < mensura, measuring, measure; see measure, n. (F. mesurer, n.) To measure; ascertain the dimensions or quantity of. [Rare.]

mensuration (men'syur-ah-shun), n. [= F. mensuration = Pr. mensuratio = Sp. mensuración, < L. mensuratio (n.), measuring, < mensurare, measure; see measure, n.] The act, art, or process of measuring; specifically, the act or art of determining length, area, volume, content, etc., by measurement and computation; as, the rules of mensuration; the mensuration of surfaces and solids.

The measure which he [the Christian] would have others mete out to himself is the standard whereby he desires to be tried in his mensurations to all others. Ep. Hall, The Christian, § 11.

mensurative (men'syur-ah-tiv), a. [L. mensuratus + -iv.] Capable of measuring; adapted for measurement, or for taking the measure of things.

"Yes, Friends," observes the Professor, "not our Logical, Mensurative faculty, but our Imaginative one, is King over us." Carlyle, Sartor Resartus (ed. 1831), p. 163.

The third method spoken of may be called the mensurative. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXII, 342.

ment¹. An obsolete preterit of mean¹.

ment². An obsolete preterit of ming¹.

ment³, n. A variant of mind³.

-ment. [ME. -ment = OF. -ment = F. -ment = Sp. -mento = It. -mento, < L. -mentum, a common suffix, forming from verbs nouns denoting the result of an act or the act itself; as in alimentum, nourishment, < alere, nourish; fragmentum, a piece broken off, < frangere (frag.), break; segmentum, a piece cut off, < secare, cut (L. L.); regimentum, rule, < regere, rule; monumentum, that which keeps in mind, < monere, keep in mind, advise, etc.] A common suffix of Latin origin, forming from verbs, nouns which usually denote the results of an act or the act itself, as in aliment, fragment, segment, commandment, document, monument, government, etc. It is much used as an English suffix, being attachable to almost any verb, whether of Latin or French origin, as in movement, newishment, payment, as well as to many of purely English or other Teutonic origin, as in abovement, abovement, banishment, bedevilement, meriment, etc.

menta, n. Plural of mentum.

mentagra (men-ta-gra), n. [L. mentum, the chin, < Gr. agnē, a taking, catching (cf. chiragra, podagra, etc.).] In pathol., an eruption about the chin, forming a crust like that which occurs in scald-head.

mental¹ (men'tal), a. [F. mental = Sp. Pg. mental = It. mental, < L. mentalis, of the mind, mental, < L. mens (t), the mind; see mind¹, n.] 1. Of or pertaining to the mind; specifically, belonging to or characteristic of the intellect; intellectual; as, the mental powers or faculties; a mental state or condition; mental perception.

Twist his mental and his active parts Kingdom's Achilles in confusion rears. Shak., T. and C., II, 3, 126.

That modification of the sublime which arises from a strong expression of mental energy. D. Stewart, Philos. Essays, II, 3.

In what manner the mental powers were first developed in the lowest organisms is as hopeless an inquiry as how life first originated. Darwin, Descent of Man, I, 25.

2. Done or performed by the mind; due to the action of the mind.

By mental analysis we mean the taking apart of a complex whole and attending separately to its parts. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 335.

3. Relating to the mind; concerned with the nature, attributes, or phenomena of the human intellect; as, mental philosophy; mental sciences. Mental alienation, insanity. Mental arithmetic, association, modification, etc. See the nouns.

mental² (men'tal), a. [= F. mental, < L. mentium, the chin; see mentum.] In anat., of or pertaining to the mentum or chin; genial. — Mental artery, a branch of the inferior dental branch of the internal maxillary artery, issuing from the mental foramen to be distributed to the chin and lower lip.

Mental foramen. See foramen. Mental fossa, a depression on the outer surface of the lower jaw-bone for the attachment of the muscle acting upon the chin.

Mental nerves, several terminal branches of the inferior dental nerve, issuing from the mental foramen. — Mental point, in craniol., the foremost median point of the lower border of the lower jaw, at the symphysis menti. — Mental prominence, the projection beyond the vertical of the lower anterior border of the lower jaw-bone. It is highly characteristic and almost diagnostic of the human species.

Mental spines. Same as mental tubercles. Mental suture, in entom., the impressed line dividing the mentum from the gula. — Mental tubercles. Same as genal tubercles (which see, under penial).

mental³ (men'tal), n. An Oriental water-tight basket, having four ropes attached, by which two men raise water from a stream or cistern and discharge it into a trench for irrigation. E. H. Knight.

mentality (men-tal'i-ti), n. [L. mental + -ity.] Mental action or power; intellectual activity; intellectuality.

The "Catholic World" laments the decay of mentality in Protestant England, finding the cause of its unhappiness in the fact that the British magazine is so poor an affair as it is. This is but a dangerous criterion of mentality. The Nation, Aug. 3, 1871, p. 78.

A certain amount of mentality or cultivation accompanied the result. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII, 450.

Hudibras has the same hard mentality. Emerson, English Traits, xiv.

mentalization (men'tal-i-zah-shun), n. [L. mentalize + -ation.] Operation of the mind; mental action; manner of thinking. [Rare.]

Previous to the establishment of complete delirium or delusions there may be traced deviations from healthy mentalization. E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 101.

mentalize (men'tal-iz), v. t.: pret. and pp. mentalized, ppr. mentalizing. [L. mental + -ize.] To develop mentally; cultivate the mind or in intellect of; excite to mental activity.

The only thing that can ever undermine our school system in popular support is a suspicion that it does not moralize as well as mentalize children. U. S. Hall, in N. A. Rev.

mentally (men'tal-i), adv. [L. mental + -ly.] Intellectually; in the mind; in thought or meditation; in idea.

There is no assignable portion of matter so minute that it may not, at least mentally (to borrow a school-term), be further divided into still lesser and lesser parts. Boyle, Works, I, 401.

mentation (men-ta'shun), n. [L. mentum, the mind, + -ation.] 1. The action or exercise of the mind or of its physical organ; mental activity; ideation; ideation; ideation; ideation; ideation.

The most absurd mentation and most extravagant actions in many people are the survival of their fittest states. Pop. Sci. Mo., CXXV, 173.

2. The result of mentation; state of mind.

mentory (men'to-ri), n. [F. menterie, lying, falsehood, < mentir, < L. mentiri, lie; see mendacious.] Lying.

Mentha (men'tha), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. mentha, mint; see mint.] A genus of aromatic labiate plants belonging to the tribe Satureeae, type of the subtribe Menthoidae. It is characterized by 4 stamens, which are nearly equal and distant or diverging, with parallel anthers, and by a calyx which is 10-nerved and 5-toothed. Over 200 species have been described, but the plants vary greatly, and the number may be reduced to 25; they are widely distributed over the world, but are found principally in the temperate regions. They are erect diffuse herbs with opposite leaves, and flowers in dense whorls, arranged in terminal or axillary heads or spikes. The common name of the genus is mint. See mint, horsemint, allspice, peppermint, and peppermint.

menthene (men'then), n. [L. mentha, mint, + -ene.] A liquid hydrocarbon (C₁₀H₁₈) obtained from peppermint-oil.

Menthoides (men-thoi'de-ō), n. pl. [NL. (Benth, 1832), < Mentha + -oides.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Satureeae. It is characterized by distant or divaricate stamens, with anthers which are 2-elliptical, at least when young, and by a calyx which is almost always from 5- to 10-nerved. It embraces 21 genera, of which Mentha is the type, and about 500 species, although the latter number may be much reduced. The plants are found in both hemispheres, but are almost wholly confined to the temperate or subtropical regions.

menthol (men'thol), n. [L. mentha, mint, + -ol.] In chem., a solid crystalline body (C₁₀H₂₀O) which separates from oil of peppermint on standing. It has the odor of peppermint, melts at 108° F., and volatilizes unchanged at a higher temperature. It is used in medicine as a local application in neuralgia. Also called peppermint-camphor.

It was known that menthol . . . generated a keen feeling of cold on being spread over the forehead. Dr. Goldschneider, Nature, XXXIV, 71.

Menticirrus (men-ti-sir'us), n. [NL., orig. Menticirrus (Gill, 1861), < L. mentum, the chin, + cirrus, a tuft of hair; see cirrus.] A genus of scimenoid fishes. There are about 11 species, all American, as M. nebulosus, of the Atlantic coast of the United States, where it is known as kingfish, whiting, and barb; M. alburnus, a more southern whiting of the same coast, and M. undulatus, the hags of the Pacific coast. They are highly prized for the table. See cut under kingfish.

menticultural (men-ti-kul'tur-ah), a. [L. mentum (n.), the mind, + cultura, culture; see culture.] Cultivating or improving the mind. [Imp. Dict.] mentiferous (men-tif'e-rus), a. [L. mentum (n.), the mind, + ferre = F. bear.] Conveying or transferring mind or thought; telepathic; as, mentiferous ether. [Recent.]

mention (men'shun), n. [ME. mention, mencon, < OF. mention, F. mention = Sp. mención = It. menzione, < L. mentio (n.), a calling; to mind, a speaking, mention, akin to men (n.), mind, < memini (✓ men, min), have in mind, remember; see mind¹.] 1. Statement about or reference to a person or thing; notice or remark; especially, assertion or statement without details or particulars.

He did many grite dedes of armes, of which he yet made no mention, till that my water com ther-to. Martin (E. E. T. S.), I, 126.

And sleep in dull, cold marble where no mention of me more must be heard of. Shak., Hen. VIII, III, 2645.

Let us . . . speak of things at hand (useful; whence haply mention may arise of something not unreasonable to ask. Milton, P. L., vii, 200.

Now, the mention [of God's name] is vain, when it is useless. Paley, Moral Philos., iv, 1.

2. Indication; evidence. [Rare.]

If [the earthquake] brought up the sea a great way upon the maine Land, which is carried backe with it into the Sea, not leaving mention that the reed beene Land. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 582.

3. Note; reputation.

'Tis true, I have been a rascal, as you are, A fellow of no mention, nor no mark. Fletcher (and another?), Truphagus, v, 2.

4. Report; account.

And wheresoever my fortunes shall conduct me, So worthy mentions I shall render of you, So vertuous and so fair. Beau. and Fl., Custom of the Country, I, 1.

mention (men'shun), v. t. [F. mentionner = Sp. Pg. mencionar = It. menzionare, < ML. mentionare, mention, < L. mentio (n.), mention; see mention, n.] To make mention of; speak of; briefly or cursorily; speak of; name; refer to.

I will mention the lovingkindness of the Lord. Ps. lxxvi, 7.

I mention Egypt where proud kings Did our forefathers yoke. Eden, Pains of Hell.

This road was formerly called Via Antoniana; the descent to it is difficult, and a Latin inscription is cut on the

The Upper Part of Peppermint (Mentha), with flowers. A flower, 2, calyx.

... mentioning the name of the road, and that it was made by the emperor Aurelian.

mentionable (men'ah-n-ə-bl), a. [< mention + -able.] That can or may be mentioned.

mentohyoid (men-tō-hi'oid), a. and n. [< L. mentum, the chin, + NL. hyoides, hyoid.] 1. a. Pertaining to the chin and to the hyoid bone.

2. n. An occasional muscle in man, passing between the chin and the hyoid bone.

mentomeckelian (men-tō-me-kō'li-an), n. [< L. mentum, the chin, + Meckel (see def.) + -ian.] A distal division of Meckel's cartilage around which the lower jaw ossifies, as distinguished from a proximal division which is converted into a part of the suspensorium of the jaw or an ossicle of the ear.

mentonnière (mōn-ton'jār'), n. [< OF. mentoniere, < menton, the chin, < L. mentum, the chin; see mentum.] 1. Same as beaver, 2. A piece of armor, used on occasions of special danger as an appendage to the open helmet, worn about the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was put on outside of the gorget, secured to the helmet by hooks on each side and by a slot of similar construction at the embrel, and thus replaced the visor and beaver of the armor, except that it was not capable of being raised, but had to be removed altogether.

3. An extra defense used during the joust, protecting the throat and lower part of the face. [Rare.] mentor (men'tor), n. [< L. Mentor, < Gr. Mētor, Mentor (or Athena in his guise), friend and adviser of Odysseus (Ulysses) and of Telemachus; prob. 'adviser,' akin to L. monitor, adviser; see monitor.] One who acts as a wise and faithful guide and monitor, especially of a younger person; an intimate friend who is also a sage counselor, as of one who is young or inexperienced.

mentorial (men-tō'ri-əl), a. [< mentor + -ial.] Containing advice or admonition.

mentum (men'tum), n.; pl. menta (-tā). [L. the chin.] 1. The chin; the anterior and inferior part of the mandible or under jawbone of a mammal, with or without associated soft parts. It sometimes is regarded as including the parts in the whole intranasal space, or interval between the horizontal ramus of the mandible.

2. In entom., the median or central and usually principal part of the labium. The term has been applied to different parts of the labium, in different insects and also in the same insect, whence confusion has arisen, especially in the use of the terms mentum and submentum. The mentum is properly the part of the labium between the submentum and the ligula, and is often less conspicuous than either of these—see labium, and cut at mouth-parts.

3. In bot., a projection in front of the flower in some orchids, caused by the extension of the foot of the column.—Levator menti. See levator.

Mentum absconditum, the retreating chin, not attaining to a perpendicular let fall from the alveolar border of the jaw; a chin with no prominence.—Mentum prominens, the protrusive chin, extending beyond a perpendicular let fall from the alveolar border of the jaw.

Quadratus menti, the depressor labii inferioris, a muscle of the chin which draws down the lower lip. Symphysis menti, the midline of union of the two halves of the lower jawbone.—Tooth of the mentum. Same as mentum-tooth.—Triangularis menti, the depressor anguli oris, a muscle which draws down the corner of the mouth.

mentum-tooth (men'tum-tōth), n. In entom., a small median process on the front margin of the mentum, generally within an emargination. It is found in certain Coleoptera.

Mentzelia (ment-zē'li-ā), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after C. Mentzel, a botanical author of Brandenburg in the 17th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Loasaceae. It is distinguished by a one-celled ovary with an indefinite number of ovules, by having no scales on the corolla, and by alternate leaves. About 10 species are known, which are found in the warmer and tropical regions of America, especially to the western part. They are herbs or small shrubs, usually with rigid succulent bearded hairs, leaves which are mostly ovate cordate or pinnatifid, and yellow or white flowers, which are solitary or corymbose.

menage (mə-nā'), n. [< F., < L. menium, seat, of menium, small; see meniscus.] A bill of fare.

You have read the menu, may you read it again: Champagne, perigord, gaintine, and—champagne.

... and—champagne. Looker, Mr. Planch's Flirtation.

Menura (mə-nū'ra), n. [NL., so called in ref. to the extraordinary form of the tail (which is otherwise compared to a lyre), < Gr. mēnē, the moon, + eura, tail.] The typical and only known genus of Menuridae. Three species are described: M. superba, M. victoria, and M. alberti, all of Australia, and two apparently valid. See under lyre-bird. Also written, incorrectly, Menura, Menura.

menurancet, n. See menurancet.

menuride, n. See menuride.

Menuridae (mə-nū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menura + -idae.] An Australian family of anomalous or pseudosciniine passerine birds, represented by the genus Menura; the lyre-birds. It is one of two families (the other being Atrichidae) which, though belonging to the order Passeres, deviate from the normal passerine type in the structure of the vocal organs and in some other particulars, to such an extent that a separate division of the order has been established for their reception. (See Menuridae and Pseudosciniidae.) The remarkable conformation of the tail of the male birds early attracted attention, and the size and general appearance of the birds caused them for many years to be considered as raptorial or gallinaceous, they being accordingly ranked with the mound-birds, curassows, and guinea. Subsequently they were referred by some authors to the American family of rock-wrens (Petrochelidonidae). It is only of late years that a knowledge of the anatomical structure has enabled ornithologists to classify the family correctly.

menuroid (mə-nū'roid), a. Having the characters of the Menuridae; pseudosciniine.

Menuridae (mə-nū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menura + -idae.] A superfamily of pseudosciniine passerine birds containing the Menuridae and Atrichidae, or the Australian lyre-birds and scrub-birds, characterized by the abnormal structure of the acromyodian syrinx, and the disposition of the tensor patagii brevis as in picarian birds.

menuse, n. A Middle English form of minish.

Menyanthes (men-i-an'the-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Griseb., 1830), < Menyanthes + -es.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Gentianaceae, the gentian family. It is characterized by having radical or alternate leaves, and by the lobes of the corolla being imbricate-valvate in the bud. It embraces 4 genera, of which Menyanthes is the type, and about 40 species.

Menyanthes (men-i-an'the-ā), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), improp. for Menyanthes or Menyanthes, < Gr. menyan, or menyan, monthly, or phy. month, + anthos, flower.] A genus of plants of the natural order Gentianaceae, type of the tribe Menyanthaceae. It is characterized by a capsule which breaks open irregularly at the top into two partial valves, and by long petiolate radical leaves, which are trifoliate or round, reniform, and serrate. There are two species, or perhaps only one, M. exaltata, the bog bean, buck bean, or marsh-celery. They are herbaceous water-plants, with a creeping rootstock, sheathed by the membranous bases of the long petioles, and bear white or bluish flowers, which grow in a raceme at the apex of a long leafless scape. See top-bean.

menyanthin (men-i-an'thin), n. [< Menyanthes + -in.] A bitter principle obtained from Menyanthes trifoliata.

menyet, n. Other forms of menyet.

menyet, n. A Middle English form of menyet.

menzie (mē'zi-ē), n. A Scotch form of menyet.

Before all the menzie, and in her moment of power, the Queen humbled her to the dust by taking her with her shame. Scott, Abbot, 1841.

Menziesia (men-zē'zi-ā), n. [NL. (J. E. Smith, 1806), so named after Archibald Menzies (died 1842), surgeon and naturalist to the expedition under Vancouver. The surname Menzies, prop. Menzies (the z being orig. merely another shape of y), appears to be derived from ME. menzie, i. e. menyet, var. of menye, etc., a house-hold; see menyet.] A genus of plants of the natural order Ericaceae and the tribe Rhododendraceae. It is distinguished by the loose coat of the seeds, the short gamopetalous corolla, and the 4-toothed ovary. There are 7 species, natives of North America, Japan and Kamchatka, shrubs with alternate petiolate entire deciduous leaves, and small or medium sized flowers in terminal racemes. One species, M. glandulosa, is found in the Alleghenies. The Irish heath, Daboena polytricha, was formerly included in this genus.

meoblet, a. and n. See noble.

meont, n. [< Gr. mēnē, the moon; see Meun, 2. meont.] Same as meunt. Minchen.

Mephistophelean (mef'is-tō-fē'lē-an), a. [< Mephistopheles + -an.] Same as Mephistophelean.

Wit is apt to be cold ... and Mephistophelean in men who have no relish for humanity. George Eliot, Essays (German Writ.).

Mephistopheles (mef'is-tō-fē'lēz), n. [Written Mephistophilus in Shakespeare, Fletcher, etc.]

Mephistopheles in Marlowe, but now generally Mephistopheles, as in Goethe; a made-up name, like most of the names of the medieval devils. Whether the orig. concealer of the name meant to form it from (Gr. mēnē, the moon, + phos, light, + phos, loving (a plausible etymology, though the formation is irregular), or from some other elements (some conjecture Gr. mēnē, a cloud, + phos, loving), or merely concocted a Greek-sounding name of no meaning, must be left to conjecture. The name of a familiar spirit mentioned in the old legend of Sir John Faustus, and a principal agent in Marlowe's play of Dr. Faustus, and in Goethe's "Faust."

Then he may pleasure the king, at a dead pinch too, Without a Mephistopheles, such as thou art. Fletcher, Wife for a Month, v. 1.

Mephistopheles ... is the Spirit of Negation, and his being exists through opposition to the positive Truth, and Order, and Beauty, which proceed from the never-ending creative energy of the Deity ... His irreverence and irony are ... a part of his nature. K. Taylor, Faust, l. note 51.

Mephistophilus (mef'is-tō-fē'lē-an), a. [Also Mephistopheles; < Mephistopheles + -us.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling in character the spirit Mephistopheles; diabolical; sardonic; jeering; irreverent.

mephitic (mef'it'ik), a. [= F. mephitique = Sp. mephitico = Pg. mephitico = It. mephitico, < L. mephiticus, pestilential, < L. mephitis, a pestilential exhalation; see mephitis.] Pertaining to mephitis; foul; noxious; pestilential; poisonous; stinking.

The schools kept the thinking faculty alive and active, when the disturbed state of civil life, the mephitic atmosphere engendered by the dominant ecclesiasticism, and the almost total neglect of natural knowledge might well have stifled it. Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXI, 106.

That strange and scarcely known ill, alas! of almost mephitic odor, the xerophyllia. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII, 305.

Mephitic gas, carbon dioxide.

mephitical (mef'it'ik-əl), a. [< mephitis + -al.] Same as mephitis.

mephitically (mef'it'ik-əl), adv. [< mephitical + -ly.] With mephitis; foully; pestilentially.

Mephitis (mef'it'is), n. pl. [NL., < Mephitis + -is.] A subfamily of Mustelidae peculiar to America, typified by the genus Mephitis; the skunks. The group is closely related to the badgers of Melinae and to the African Zorillinae, the three being combined by some authors. But the Mephitis are distinguished by having 2 or 4 more teeth in the lower than in the upper jaw, the back upper molar quadrants, and the premolars 3 above and below on each side (in one genus only 2 above on each side). The form is stout, with moderately developed limbs, unwebbed digits, and long bushy tail. The coloration is black and white, there is no subcapular pouch as in badgers but the perineal glands are enormously developed, secreting the fetid fluid which forms a means of defense and offense. The holds are terrestrial and to some extent fossorial. There are 3 genera, Mephitis, Spilogale, and Conopsea.

mephitis (mef'it'is), n. [< L. mephitis, a pestilential exhalation; personified, Mephitis, also Mephitis, a goddess who averts pestilential exhalations.] 1. A pestilential exhalation, especially from the earth; any noxious or ill-smelling emanation, as from putrid or filthy substances; a noxious or poisonous stench.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of skunks, typical of the subfamily Mephitinae. The teeth are 34 in number, 16 above and 18 below. The pelage is very long, the tail long and very bushy, and the coloration black, striped or spotted with white. The palatal ends opposite the last molar; the nostril process is flaring; the pericardium is not much inflated; the zygonia rise backward, and the profile of the skull is highest over the orbits. The nostrils are lateral, and the sides hairy at least in part. There are several species, of North and Central America, the best-known of which is M. mephitis, the common skunk. M. macrura is the long-tailed skunk of Mexico. The little striped skunk, M. putorius of the United States, is referred by Coues to the genus Spilogale. The South American and African skunks which have been referred to Mephitis belong to other genera. See skunk.

mephitism (mef'it'iz-m), n. [< mephitis + -ism.] Same as mephitis. 1. Phlogisticon.

Mercantile law, the law applicable to commercial transactions; the law merchant. See law merchant, under law.

Mercantile system, in polit. econ., the belief, generally held till the end of the last century, that all wealth consists in gold and silver, and that therefore the exportation of goods and importation of gold should be encouraged by the state, while the importation of goods and the exportation of gold should be forbidden, or at least restricted as much as possible.

While there are so many things to render the assumption which is the basis of the mercantile system plausible, there is also some small foundation in reason, though a very insufficient one, for the distinction which that system so emphatically draws between money and every other kind of valuable possession.

J. N. Mill, Pol. Econ., Prelim. Rem.

Thus, the Mercantile System admits every mode of applying the three factors of production, but considers them really productive only in so far as they increase the quantity of the precious metals possessed by the nation, either through the agency of mining at home or by means of foreign trade. W. Roscher, Pol. Econ. (trans.), I, 169.

Syn. Mercantile, Commercial. Commercial is the broader term, including the other. Mercantile applies only to the actual purchase and sale of goods, according to one's line of business, the mercantile class in a community comprises all such as are actually in the business of buying and selling. Commercial covers the whole theory and practice of commerce, home or foreign; as, the British are a commercial people; commercial usages, honor, law. The word is applicable wherever the more varied activities of commerce are concerned.

mercantilism (mër'kan-til-izm), n. [< mercantile + -ism.] 1. The mercantile spirit or character; devotion to trade and commerce; excessive importance attached to traffic, or to exchange of values in any way.

Mercantilism is drawing into its vortex the intellectual strength of the nation. The Century, XXXI, 311.

2. In polit. econ., the mercantile system, or the theories embodied in it. See mercantile.

Indeed, it has been justly observed that there are in him (Hume) several traces of a refined mercantilism, and that he represents a state of opinion in which the transition from the old to the new view is not yet completely effected. Encyc. Brit., XIX, 364.

mercantilist (mër'kan-til-ist), n. [< mercantile + -ist.] 1. A devotee of mercantilism; a believer in the supreme importance of trade and commerce. — 2. In polit. econ., an advocate of the mercantile system, or of some similar theory.

The mercantilists may be best described, as Roscher has remarked, not by any definite economic theorem which they held in common, but by a set of theoretic tendencies, commonly found in combination, though severally prevailing in different degrees in different minds.

Encyc. Brit., XIX, 364.

mercantilistic (mër'kan-til-istik), a. [< mercantile + -ic.] Pertaining to mercantilism, or to the mercantile system in political economy; characteristic of mercantilists.

From the seventeenth century mercantilistic views began to exercise a more and more marked influence upon financial literature. Enc. of Pol. Science, II, 197.

2. A dealer in cloths of different sorts, especially silk. [Eng.]

She feels not how the hand drops away, nor the acres melt; nor foresees the change, when the merc has your woods for her velvet. B. Jonson, Epitaph, II, 1.

mercerization (mër'sér-i-zā'shon), n. [< mercerize + -ation.] A process of treating cotton fiber or fabrics, invented by John Mercer, a Lancashire calico-printer, and patented in 1851. He discovered that the steeping of cotton cloth from ten to twenty minutes in caustic and syrupy potash lye, and then washing out the cloth with alcohol of specific gravity 0.825, caused the texture to contract one tenth on drying, retaining 14.7 per cent. of potash. If analysis of specific gravity 1.312 is substituted for the potash, the cloth shrinks one fourth and contains 9.6 per cent. of soda. Water abstracts all the soda, and leaves the shrunken tissue, which takes more brilliant colors in dyeing than unmercerized calico. Also spelled mercerisation.

mercerize (mër'sér-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mercerized, ppr. mercerizing. [< Mercer (see def. of mercerization) + -ize.] To treat (cotton fiber or fabrics) with a solution of caustic alkali according to the method of mercerization. Also spelled mercerise.

The microscopic examination of a mercerized cotton fiber shows it to have lost all its original characteristics. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI, 342.

mercerhip (mër'sér-ship), n. [< mercer + -ship.] The occupation or business of a mercer.

merchant (mər'chant), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also merchant, marchant, marchant, marchand; < ME. marchand, marchant, OF. marchand, marchant, marchant, F. marchand = Sp. mercante; = It. mercante, a trader, merchant, < L. mercator (-tor), a buyer, ppr. of mercari, trade, traffic, buy, < mercz (n. re-), merchandise, traffic, < merce, mereri, gain, buy, purchase, also deserve, merit see mercy and merit. Etymologically the adj. precedes the noun; but the noun appears to be earlier in E.] I. n. 1. One who is engaged in the business of buying commercial commodities and selling them again for the sake of profit; especially, one who buys and sells in quantity or by wholesale. One who buys without selling again, or who sells without having bought, as where one sells products of his own labor, or who buys and sells exclusively articles not the subject of ordinary commerce, or who buys and sells commercial articles on salary and not for profit, is not usually termed a merchant. Those who buy or sell on a commission for others are termed commission-merchants. In the law of bankruptcy, which forbids a discharge to merchants and traders who have not kept proper books of account, the term has a more extended meaning, having been held to include a heavy-stable keeper who buys hay and grain and indirectly sells it by boarding horses, but not a broker who speculates in stocks.

Thidre cometh Marchaunt with Marchandise be Son, from Yndos, Perce, Caldeo, Ermony, and of many others Kyngdomes. Manderly, Travels, p. 122.

Ye merchants that use the trade of merchandise, Use lawful wares and reasonable price. Habesh Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 354.

Merchant Adventurers. See adventurer. Merchant bar, merchant iron, an iron bar which has been finished by passing through the merchant rolls. Puddled bars (see puddle) are worked into merchant iron or merchant bar by being cut into pieces of suitable length, which are then piled in packets, heated to a welding heat, and then hammered and rolled, or rolled without hammering, into bars of suitable shape to be put upon the market. The amount of labor bestowed on this process depends on the quality of the iron it is desired to produce. Puddled bars which have been rolled a second time are called "No. 2," and this is what is usually designated as merchant bar. It is the lowest quality of iron available for the general smith's use. If piled and rolled again, the product is called "No. 3." Another repetition of the process furnishes an article known as "best best," and still another gives "trouble best." Merchant captain or seaman, a captain or seaman employed in the merchant service. Merchant prince, a merchant of great wealth.

All persons unjustly exiled by Nero . . . he mercifully restored againe to their country and honour. Sir H. Sand, tr. of Tacitus, p. 11.

mercifulness (mər'si-fūl-nēs), n. This quality of being merciful; tenderness toward the faults or needs of others; readiness to forgive offense or relieve suffering.

mercify, v. t. [< mercy + -fy.] To pity.

Many did desire, Without she did weep, of no man mercifide. Spenser, F. Q., VI. vii. 32.

merciless (mər'si-lēs), a. [< merry + -less.] 1. Destitute of mercy; unfeeling; pitiless; hard-hearted; cruel; relentless; unsparring; as, a merciless tyrant.

The foe is merciless and will not pity: But at their hands I have deserved no pity. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., II. 3. 26.

She was merciless in exacting retribution. Prescott, Ferd. and Is., II. 19.

She hauled me to the wash stand, inflicted a mercurial, but happily brief scrub of my face and hands with soap, water, and a warm towel. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, iv.

2. Without hope of mercy. [Rare.]

And all dismay through mercurious despair.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, vii

syn 1. Unmerciful, severe, measurable, unrelenting but baroque, average mercilessly (mēr' a les-ly), adv. In a merciless manner; cruelly.

mercilessness (mēr' a les-ness), n. The quality of being merciless; want of mercy or pity.

merciment (mēr' sī-ment), n. See mercement.

mercurammonium (mēr ku ra-mō'n-um), n. [Ni., Mercurus, mercury, + ammonium.] A compound of mercury and ammonium specifically applied to bases in which mercury replaces a part or all of the hydrogen in ammonium. Examples are mercurous ammonium chloride, $(\text{NH}_4)_2\text{HgCl}_2$ and mercuric ammonium chloride, $(\text{NH}_4)_2\text{HgCl}_4$ known as white precipitate. Mercurammonium chloride, the hydrogynous ammonium or white precipitate of the United States and British Pharmacopoeia.

mercurial (mēr-kū' ri-əl), a. and n. [L. Mercurius = Sp. Pg. Mercurio = It. mercurio, < L. Mercurius, of or pertaining to the god Mercury or to the planet Mercury, < Mercurius, Mercury; see Mercury.] 1. a. 1. [cap.] Pertaining to the god Mercury; having the form or qualities attributed to Mercury.

His foot Mercurial, his Martial thigh.
Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2, 310.

To see thee young, yet manage so thine arms,
Have a mercurial nimble and martial hands.
Shak., A. and C. to Prince Henry

2. Like Mercury in character; having the moral or mental qualities ascribed to the god Mercury, or supposed by astrologists to belong to those under his star, the planet Mercury; light-hearted; gay; active; sprightly; flighty; flexible; changeable; volatile.

He is . . . of a disposition, perhaps, rather too mercurial for the chamber of a nervous invalid.

Burman, Ingoldsby Legends, I, 190.

Mercurial races are never sublime.

De Quincey, Secret Societies, II.

3. Pertaining to Mercury as god of trade; hence, pertaining to trade or money-making; as, mercurial pursuits.

His (Monroe's) mind being more martial than mercurial, . . . he applied himself to sea service.

Wood, Atlantic Ocean, I.

Properties pertaining to the practice of the law, as well as to the mercurial profession.

P. Whitehead, Gymnasium, I, note.

4. Pertaining to Mercury as herald; hence, giving intelligence; pointing out; directing.

As the traveller is directed by a mercurial statue.
Chillingworth, Religion of Protestants.

5. Pertaining or relating to mercury or quicksilver. (a) Containing or consisting of quicksilver or mercury; as mercurial preparations or medicines. (b) Characterized by the use of mercury; as, mercurial treatment. (c) Caused by the use of mercury; as, a mercurial disease.

Hepatic mercurial ore, cinnabar. Mercurial bath, orethm, gaze. See the nouns. Mercurial gilding, same as wash gilding. Mercurial horn-ore, same as calomel. Mercurial level, ointment, pendulum, thermometer, etc. See the nouns.

II, n. 1. A person possessing any of the attributes of the god Mercury; one of mercurial temperament; a sprightly person; also, one given to trickery; a cheat or thief.

Come, brave mercurials, sublimed in cheating,
My dear companions, follow soldiers
In the watchful exercise of thievery.

T. Parnes, A. Albumazar I, I

2. A preparation of mercury used as a drug.

The question with the modern physician is not, as with the ancient, . . . Shall mercurials be administered?

H. Spencer, Study of Sociology, p. 71.

mercurialine (mēr-kū' ri-əl-īn), n. [Ni. Mercurialis + -ine.] A volatile alkaloid ($\text{C}_8\text{H}_5\text{N}$) extracted from the leaves and seed of Mercurialis annua. It is a poisonous oily liquid, isomeric and possibly identical with methylamine.

Mercurialis (mēr-kū' ri-ā' līs), n. [Ni. (Tournesfort, 1700), < L. mercurialis, see herba, a plant, proph. dog's-mercury; see mercurial.] A genus of plants of the natural order Euphorbiaceae, the tribe Crotoneae, and the subtribe Asclepiadeae. It is composed of a species of herbs native in Europe, the Mediterranean region, and eastern Asia. M. perennis, the dog's-mercury, is a poisonous weed, with a simple erect stem six or eight inches high, the oblong or ovate lanceolate leaves crowded on its upper half, the flowers & divisions on slender axillary peduncles. M. tomentosa of the Mediterranean region was long supposed to have the power of determining the sex of children according as the mother drank the juice of the male or of the female plant. See mercury, S. and boy's girl's, and golden mercury (under mercury).

mercurialization, mercurialize. See mercurization, mercurialize.

mercurialism (mēr-kū' ri-āl-izm), n. [Mercurial + -ism.] The pathological condition produced by the use of mercury.

The other patient, on the contrary, showed no signs of mercurialism whatever.

Lancet, No. 2447, p. 600.

mercurialist (mēr-kū' ri-āl-ist), n. [Mercurial + -ist.] 1. One who is under the influence of the planet Mercury, or one resembling the god Mercury in fickleness of character.

Mercurialists are solitary, much in contemplation, subtle.

Barton, Anat. of Mel., p. 120.

2. A physician much given to the use of mercury in the treatment of disease. Douglas.

3. A scholar; a rhetorician.

He who with a deep insight marketh the nature of our Mercurialists shall find as in a harbour for pride under a scholar's cap as under a soldier's helmet.

Greene, Farewell to Folie mercurialization (mēr-kū' ri-āl-ī-zā'shon), n. [Mercurialize + -ation.] The act of mercurializing, or the state of being mercurialized. Also spelled mercurialisation.

Premature delivery appeared to follow the mercurialization of the system.

A. S. Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 418.

mercurialize (mēr-kū' ri-āl-ī-zē, v. pret. and pp. mercurialized, ppr. mercurializing). [Mercurial + -ize.] 1. trans. To be capricious or fantastic.

II, trans. 1. To treat or impregnate with mercury, as by exposure to its vapor, or immersion in a chemical solution of it. To mercurialize a photographic negative is to subject it to the action of a solution of bichloride of mercury in order to intensify or reinforce the image. Flues of mercurialized carbon are sometimes used in microphones and in the transmitter of a telephone circuit.

2. In med., to affect with mercury, as the bodily system; bring under the influence of mercury.

Also spelled mercurialise.

mercurially (mēr-kū' ri-āl-ē), adv. 1. In a mercurial manner. — 2. By means of mercury.

Mercurian (mēr-kū' ri-ān), a. [L. Mercurius, Mercury, + -ian.] 1. Pertaining to Mercury as god of eloquence.

The mercurian heavenly charm of his rhetoric.

Nash, Hans with von to Saffron-Walden

2. Pertaining to the planet Mercury.

Absorption by a Mercurian atmosphere.

J. M. Clarke, Astrom. in 19th Cent.

mercuric (mēr ku' rik), a. [Mercur-y + -ic.] 1. Related to or containing mercury. — 2. In chem., specifically applied to compounds in which each atom of mercury is regarded as bivalent; as, mercuric chloride, HgCl_2 . Mercuric chloride, corrosive sublimate. Mercuric fulminate, fulminating mercury, detonating compound ($\text{C}_2\text{Hg}_2\text{N}_2\text{O}_6$) which crystallizes in shining gray crystals prepared from a mixture of alcohol nitric acid and mercury intrate. A moderate blow or slight friction causes it to explode violently. It is used for charging percussion caps and detonating caps for firing dynamite, etc.

mercurification (mēr ku' ri-kā'shon), n. [Mercurify + -ation see definition.] 1. In chem., the process or operation of obtaining the mercury from metallic minerals in its fluid form. — 2. The act or art of taking with quicksilver.

It remains that I perform the promise I made of adding the ways of mercurification.

Boyle, Works, I, 64.

mercurify (mēr-kū' ri-fī), v. t. pret. and pp. mercurified, ppr. mercurifying. [Mercur-y + -fy.] 1. To obtain mercury from (metallic minerals), as by the application of intense heat, which expels the mercury in fumes that are afterward condensed. — 2. To combine or mingle with mercury; mercurialize.

A part only of the metal is mercurified.

Boyle, Works, I, 64.

mercuriousness (mēr-kū' ri-ūs-ness), n. [Mercurious (< L. Mercurius, Mercury) + -ness.] The state or quality of being mercurial, or like the god Mercury, as (in the quotation) in his character of a swift messenger.

A chapman with wings, to denote the mercuriousness of this messenger.

Fuller, Worthies, Kent.

mercurism (mēr-kū' rizm), n. [Mercur-y + -ism.] A communication of news or intelligence; a communication or announcement.

See T. Brown.

mercurous (mēr-kū' rūs), a. [Mercur-y + -ous.] 1. Related to or containing mercury. — 2. In chem., specifically applied to compounds in which two atoms of mercury are regarded as forming a bivalent radical; as, mercurous chloride, Hg_2Cl_2 .

Mercury (mēr-kū' ri), n. [ME. Mercuria, mercurie, < AF. Mercurie, OF. Mercur, F. Mercur = Sp. Pg. It. Mercurio, < L. Mercurius, Mercury (the deity and the planet), so called (apparently) as the god of trade, < merc (merc-), merchandise, wages; see mercy, merchant.] 1. In Rom. myth., the name of a Roman divinity, who became identified with the Greek Hermes. He was the son of Jupiter and Maia, and was the herald and ambassador of Jupiter. As a god of darkness Mercury is the tutelary deity of thieves and tricksters. He became also the protector of herdsmen, and the god of science, commerce, and the arts and graces of life, and the patron of travelers and athletes. It was he who guided the shades of the dead to their final abiding place. He is represented in art as a young man, usually wearing a winged hat and the talia or winged sandals, and bearing the caduceus or pastoral staff and often a purse.

Mercury.—Statue of Greek workmanship, in the British Museum, London.

The herald Mercury
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.
Shak., Hamlet, III, 4, 12.

2. [L. or cap.] 1. Mercurius (-rīz). One who acts like the god Mercury in his capacity of a messenger; a conveyor of news or information; an intelligence.

Following the mirror of all Christian kings,
With winged heels, as English Mercurius.

Shak., Hen. V, II, chorus, 7.

We give the winds wings and the angels too, as being the swift messengers of God, the nimble mercuries of heaven.

Alp. Sauerbr., sermons, p. 181.

Hence—3. [L. or cap.] A common name for a newspaper or periodical publication; formerly, also, a newspaper-carrier or a seller of newspapers.

Those who sell them [news-books] by wholesale from the press are called mercuries.

Covell.

No allusion to it is to be found in the monthly Mercurius.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xli.

4. [L. or cap.] Warmth or liveliness of temperament; spirit; sprightly qualities; hence, liability to change; fickleness.

He was so full of mercury that he could not fix long in any friendship, or to any design.

Rp. Burnet.

5. The innermost planet of the solar system. Its mean distance from the sun is 0.387 that of the earth. The inclination (7 degrees) and the eccentricity (0.206) of its orbit are exceeded only by some of the minor planets. Its diameter is only 3,049 miles, or about 1/3 that of the earth. Its volume is 1/10 that of the earth as 1 to 355. It performs its sidereal revolution in 88 days, its synodical in 116. Its proximity to the sun prevents its being often seen with the naked eye. The mass of Mercury, though as yet not very precisely determined, is less than that of any other planet (asteroids excepted). According to Schiaparelli it rotates on its axis in the same way as the moon does, once in each orbital revolution.

6. [L. or cap.] Chemical symbol, Hg; atomic weight, 200. A metal of a silver-white color and brilliant metallic luster, unique in that it is fluid at ordinary temperatures. It becomes solid, or freezes, at about -40°, and crystallizes in the isometric system. Its specific gravity at 0° is 13.6; when frozen, according to J. W. Mallet, 14.182. This metal contains native, sometimes in considerable quantity; but by far the largest supply is obtained from the sulphide, known as cinnabar. (See cinnabar.) Mercury is not very generally disseminated. In the United States only traces of the ore have been found in the east of the Cordillera. The principal sources of supply are the mines of Almaden in Spain, New Almaden and others near the Bay of San Francisco, and of Idria in Austria. Its chief use is in the metallurgical treatment of gold and silver ores by amalgamation. The thermometer and barometer are instruments in which the peculiar qualities of this metal are well illustrated. Commercially the most important salts of mercury are mercurous chloride (Hg_2Cl_2) or calomel, chiefly used in medicine, and the mercuric chloride (HgCl_2) or corrosive sublimate, a violent poison used in medicine and extensively in surgery as an antiseptic, and as a preservative in dressing skins, etc., being a very powerful antiseptic. The sulphide (HgS) or cinnabar, when prepared artificially, is called corundum, and is used as a pigment. The names mercury and quicksilver are entirely synonymous, but the former is rather a scientific designation, and one necessarily used in compound names and in the adjective form; while the latter is a common popular designation of this metal. See amalgam, calomel, quicksilver.

7. [L. or cap.] The column of quicksilver in a thermometer or barometer, especially with reference to the temperature or state of the atmosphere shown by it. [Colloq.] whether they be the height of the mercury in the thermometer, a sudden and rapid fall is a sure sign of foul weather. E. Strahan, in Modern Meteorology, p. 30.

8. [L. c.] (a) A plant of the genus Mercurialis, chiefly M. perennis, the dog's-mercury, locally called Kentish balm (which see, under Kentish), and M. annua, the annual or French mercury. See Mercurialis. (b) In older usage, the Chesopodium Bonus-Henricus. See algood and good King Henry. This is the English, false, or wild mercury.—9. In her., the tincture purple, when blazoning is done by the planets.—Argentale mercury. See argenteal.—Baron's mercury [prob. orig. Barren mercury], the male plant of Mercurialis perennis.—Boy's mercury, the female plant of Mercurialis annua (the name having been mistaken).—Cornueuse mercury, same as calomel.—Extinction of mercury. See extinctio.—Girl's mercury, the male plant of Mercurialis annua. See male.—Golden mercury, Mercurialis perennis, var. gemma.—Hydrosublimite of mercury, a trade-name for calomel prepared by condensing the vapor of mercurous chloride with steam in a large receiver, which causes it to deposit in an impalpable powder absolutely free from any trace of corrosive sublimate.—Mercury agometer. See agometer.—Mercury air-pump, an apparatus used for producing a vacuum, consisting essentially of a reservoir above from which mercury flows down through a small vertical tube, the vessel to be exhausted being attached at the side (at C in the figure) at a height something more than one inch above the lower receptacle. The descending drops of mercury carry with them portions of the air or other gas from the receiver, and if the process is long continued, the supply vessel at the top being kept full, a nearly perfect vacuum may be obtained. This form of air-pump is often called a Sprengel pump. It gives a much higher degree of exhaustion than is possible with the ordinary mechanical air pump, and is much used not only in physical experiments but also for practical purposes, for example in removing the air from the glass bulbs of the incandescent electric lamps.—Mount of Mercury, in palmetistry, vegemancy, &c.—Native or virgin mercury, the pure metal found in the form of globules in cavities of the ores of this metal.—Three-seeded mercury, a plant of the genus Acalypha, of the same family as Mercurialis, and more or less similar in appearance. The fruit splits into three two-valved one-seeded achenes. It is a large genus, chiefly tropical or subtropical. Many of the species are shrubby, a few (mostly herbaceous) are found in the United States.—Transit of Mercury, a passage of Mercury over the disk of the sun.—Vegetable mercury, a Brazilian plant, Franciscana uniflora, also called manaca. See Franciscana.

Mercury Air-pump
The letter C marks the point where the vessel to be exhausted is attached.

mercury (mēr'ku-ri), n. [mercurius, n.] To wash with a preparation of mercury.

They are as tender as . . . a lady's face new mercuried.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, l. 1.

mercury-cup (mēr'ku-ri-kup), n. 1. The cylinder of a mercury barometer, which is filled with mercury and in which the lower end of the barometer-tube is inserted.—2. A small open cup containing mercury, used in electrical instruments and apparatus as a connection for conductors. The cup may be of conducting material and connected with one end of the wire forming the circuit, in which case the circuit will be closed by inserting the other end of the wire in the mercury, or the cup may be of non-conducting material, in which case both ends of the wire must be inserted in the mercury to close the circuit.

mercury-furnace (mēr'ku-ri-fēr'na), n. A furnace in which cinnabar is roasted in order to cause the pure mercury to pass off in fumes, which are condensed in a series of vessels.

mercury-gatherer (mēr'ku-ri-gath'er-er), n. In metal-working, a stirring apparatus which causes quicksilver that has become floured or mixed with sulphur in amalgamating to resume the fluid condition, through the agency of mechanical agitation and rubbing. E. H. Knight.

mercury-goosefoot (mēr'ku-ri-gōs'fūt), n. Same as mercury, 8 (b).

mercury-holder (mēr'ku-ri-hōl'der), n. A vulcanite cup, with a cover, used by dentists in preparing amalgam.

mercury-violet (mēr'ku-ri-vi-ō-let), n. The common Canterbury-bell, Campanula Medium.

mercy (mēr'si), n.; pl. mercies (-sīz). [ME. mercy, merce, merce, merai, merri. < OF. merced, merced, F. merci = Pr. merced = Sp. merced = Pg. It. merce, grace, thanks, mercy, pity, pardon. < L. merces (merced-), pay, reward, also bribe, price, detriment, condition, income, etc. ML. also thanks, grace, mercy, pity, pardon. < merca (merce-), merchandise. < merere, mereri, gain, acquire, buy, also deserve, orig. 'receive as a share': see merit. Cf. amerce, gramercy.] 1. Pitying forbearance or forgiveness; compassionate leniency toward enemies or wrongdoers; the disposition to treat offenders kindly or tenderly; the exercise of clemency in favor of an offender.

A man without merci no merci shall have
In time of need when he doth it crave.
MS. Ashmole 62 (Holliswell)

The Lord is long-suffering and of great mercy forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty
Num. xv. 18.

A woman's mercy is very little,
But a man's mercy is more.
See Hugh, or the Jew's Daughter (Child's Ballads, III. 334).

The sentiment of mercy is the natural recoil which the laws of the universe provide to protect mankind from destruction by savage passions.
Emerson, John Brown

2. An act or exercise of forbearance, good will, or favor; also, a kindness undeserved or unexpected; a fortunate or providential circumstance; a blessing; as, it is a mercy that they escaped.

I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, which thou hast shewed unto thy servant. Gen. xxxii. 10
Even a judgment, making way for thee,
Seems in their eyes a mercy for thy sake.
Courier, Task, li. 132.

3. Pity; compassion; benevolence; as, a work of mercy.

In countless liued have y.
And never didde works of mercy.
Hymns to Virgins, etc. (E. E. T. 8, p. 9).

Which now of these three . . . was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves. . . . and he said, He that shewed mercy on him.
Luke x. 36, 37.

4. Discretionary action; unrestrained exercise of the will and the power to punish and to spare; as, to be at one's mercy (that is, wholly in one's power).

At length, upon their submission, the king took them to mercy upon their fine which was set at twelve thousand marks.
Holme's, Hen. III, an. 1261.

And the offender a life lies in the mercy
Of the duke only. Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 35.
Last, 'bout thy stiff neck we this halt—hang,
And leave thee to the mercy of the court.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, v. 2.

A lover is ever complaining of cruelty while anything is denied him, and when the lady comes to be cruel, she is, from the next moment, at his mercy.
Swift.

Covenanted mercies. See covenant. Fathers of Mercy, the name of a society of Roman Catholic missionary priests, founded in France in 1840 and introduced into the United States in 1842. For mercy for mercy's sake an explanation, usually an appeal to pity.

Per. Myself am Napier.
Who with mine eyes, never since at old, beheld
The king my father wrecked.
Mir. Alark, for mercy!
Shak., Tempest, I. 2. 437.

God-a-mercy! See God.—Great mercy! [Imitated from gramercy MF grant mercy. See gramercy.] Great favor.

Great mercy, sure, for to enlarge a thrall Whom freedom shall then turn to greatest scath!
Sprenger, F. Q., II. v. 1.

Sisters of Mercy. See clerical. Spiritual and corporal works of mercy. In the middle ages, seven great works of mercy were enumerated, called the spiritual and as many called the corporal works of mercy. The seven works of corporal mercy are: to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, clothe the naked, visit prisoners, visit the sick, harbor strangers, bury the dead, of spiritual mercy, to convert sinners, instruct the ignorant, counsel the doubtful, console the afflicted, bear wrongs patiently, forgive injuries, pray for the living and the dead. Cath. Dict.

In fulfillment of God's commandments and of the seven duties of mercy bodill and gently to many a merciful.
Idol, quoted in Hampden's From Treasures (E. E. T. 8, p. 21).

To cry (one) mercy. (a) See cry, v. (b) To proclaim a tax. Bot. Atholstan the islander was and did than mercy cry, & alle Northwales he sat to tounge his.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 28.

—Syn. 1. Clemency, etc. See leniency. mercy, v. [ME. merrien, < OF. merrier, thank, also fine, < merri, thank, morey, fine; see mercy n., and of merce, amerce.] 1. To thank.
Middleche thanne Mesdr mercede hem alle
Of heore grette gladness. Piers Plowman (A. B. C.)

2. To fine; atterce.

Forster did mercen, unquered up & down
While men of town had taken his veryson & who that was gilty thourgh the mercen was,
Merced was full hi.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 112.

mercy-seat (mēr'si-sēt), n. The place of mercy or forgiveness; the propitiatory; specifically, the covering of the ark of the covenant among the Jews. This was of gold, surmounted at each end by a cherub with outstretched wings. On this covering the blood of the yearly atonement was sprinkled, and from this place God gave his oracles to Moses or to the high priest. Hence, to approach the mercy-seat is to draw near to God in prayer.

mercy-stock, n. A propitiation.
Our Saviour, our Ransom, our Spokesman, our Mercy-stock.
Hutchinson, Works, p. 192. (James.)

mercy-stroke (mēr'si-strok), n. The death-stroke, as putting an end to pain; the coup de grâce.

merdt (mērd), n. [Also mard; < OF. (And F.) merde = Pr. mērga = Sp. merda = Pg. It. merda, < L. merda, dung, ordure.] Ordure; dung; excrement.

If after thou of garlike strouge
The savour wilt expell,
A merdt is sure the only meane
To put away the smell.
Kendall's Flowers of Epithimias (1577). (Nares.)

Haire of th' head, burnt clouts, ashk, merda, and clay.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, II. 1.

Merdivora (mēr-div'ō-rō), n. pl. [NL, fem. pl. of merdivorus; see merdivorous.] A group of dipterous insects which feed upon dung.

merdivorous (mēr-div'ō-rus), a. [NL, merdivorus, < L. merda, dung, + vorare, devour.] Feeding upon excrement; devouring dung.

mere (mēr), n. [*Formerly also meer, meere, mear; < ME. mere, meere, < AN. mere, a lake, pool, the sea, = OS. mer, a lake, = OFries. mar, a ditch, = MD. mere, meere, D. meer, meer = OHG. mari, mari, mer, mer, MHG. mer, G. meer = feel. meer = Goth. mari, a lake; = W. mōr = Gael. Skt. maru, desert, < V. mar, die; see mōr, martial. Hence in comp. mermaid, merman, etc.; and ult. deriv. marsh, marshy.] A pool; a small lake or pond. [Not used in the U. S., except artificially in some local names, in imitation of British names; as, Harlem mere in Central Park in New York.]*

Then he wender his way we pander for care,
Towards the mere of Manbury we pander for care.
Allegorical Poems (ed. Morris), II. 778.

As two fishes cast into a meer.
With fruitful spawn will furnish in a year
A town with victual.
Silverd, tr. of the Burton's Weeks, II. The colonies.

On the edge of the mere the Prince of Orange had already ordered a cluster of forts to be erected.
Molay, Dutch Republic, II. 331.

mere (mēr), n. [Formerly also meer, meere, mear, meare; < ME. mere, meere, < AN. ymerre = D. meer, a limit, boundary, = feel. marr-, border land.] 1. A boundary; boundary-line.

The fabled Team, that on the Cambrian side
Both Shropshire as a mere from Hereford divide.
Drayton, Polyolbion. (Nares.)

As it were, a common mere between lands.
Abp. Cusher, Ann. to Malpas, p. 208.

2. A bulk or furrow serving as a boundary- or dividing line in a common field; also, a boundary-stone; a milestone. [Obsolete or provincial.]—3. A private carriage-road. [North. Eng.]—4. A measure of 20 or 31 yards in the Peak of Derbyshire in England. It is defined by Bount as "20 yards in the low Peak of Derbyshire and 31 in the high." Mining claims were measured by meres, the discovery of a hole being allowed to claim two meres.

mere (mēr), v. [Also meer, meere, etc.; < merce, n.] 1. trans. To limit; bound; divide or cause division in.

That brave lioness of the Latin name,
Which meard her rule with Africa and Byzance.
Spenser, Ruins of Rome, st. 22.

At such a point,
When half to half the world opposed, lay being
The meered question. Shak., A. and C., III. 12. 10.

II. intrans. To act divisions and bounds.

For bounding and meering to him that will keep it Justly, it is a bond that binds both power and wealth.
North's Pl., I. 55. D. (Nares.)

mere (mēr), a. [Early mod. E. also meere, meere; = OF. mer, meir = Pr. mer, meir = Sp. Pg. It. mero, < L. merus, pure, unmixed (as wine), hence bare, only, mere.] 1. Pure; sheer; unmixed.

For neither can he fly nor other harm,
But trust unto his strength and manifold meere.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 34.

The most part of them are degenerated and grown all most meere Irish.
Spenser, State of Ireland.
Our wine is here mingled with water and with myrrh;
there (in the world to come) it is mere and unmixed.
Jos. Taylor, Worthing Communicant.

21. Absolute; unqualified; utter; whole; in the fullest sense.

Those who, being in mere misery, continually do call on God. Munday (Arbora's Bag, Garner, I. 204).

Certain tidings now arrived, importing the mere perdition of the Turkish fleet. Shak., Othello, II. 2. 3.

Signor Francisco, whose mere object now is woman at these years, that's the eye-saint, I know Amongst young gallants. Middleton, The Widow, v. 1.

Although there is such plenty of fish and fowls and wild beasts, yet are they so tame they will not take pains to catch it till mere hunger constrains them. Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 228.

3. Sheer; simple; nothing but (the thing mentioned); only; as, it is mere folly to do so; this is the mere fact.

'Tis a mere toy to you, sir, candle-ends. R. Jonson, Volpone, v. 1.

For'd of mere necessity to eat. He comes to pawn his dish, to buy his meat. Congreve, II. of Antiquaries, I.

A mere courtier, a mere soldier, a mere scholar, a mere anything, is an insipid pedantic character. Adams, The Man of the Town.

Mere right, in law, the right of property without possession. = Byn. Mere, bare. Mere is much oftener used than bare. Bare is positive; mere is essentially negative. Strictly, bare means only without other things or no more than; as, the bare mention of a name. Mere seems to imply deficiency; as, mere conjecture, mere folly. In implying smallness of amount it is sometimes the same as bare. In Shakespeare, Hamlet, III. 1, "a bare bodkin" might be expressed by "a mere bodkin."

mere³ (mēr), adv. [OF. mere³, a.] Absolutely; wholly.

On my faith, your highness Is mere mistaken in me. Pletcher, Mad Lover, III. 1.

I know I shall produce things more divine. Mardon, The Fawn, II. 1.

mere⁴ (mēr), a. [*ME., also mere, marc; AS. mēre, mēra = OS. mār = OHG. mār, MHG. mēre = Goth. mār = Goth. mēra (in comp. mēra-mēra), famous; akin to L. mēmōr, mindful, remembering, Skt. √ smar, Zend mar, remember: see memory.]* Famous.

mere⁵, a. A Middle English form of marc. mergoutte (mēr'gūt), n. [F. mēre-goutte, < L. mēra, pure, unmixed, + gūta (> F. goutte), a drop: see mere³ and gout.] The first running of must, oil, etc., from the fruit before pressure has been applied to it: usually limited to the juice of the grape.

merelst, n. [Also merelles, merils; < ME. merels, < OF. merelle, a guine, nine men's morris, F. mērelle, mērelle, hopscotch, < mērel (ML. merellus, merallus), a counter, token, a piece in draughts, also a game.] A game also called floppenny or nine men's morris, played with counters or pawns. See morris.

Merelles or, as it was formerly called in England, nine men's morris, and also five penny morris, is a game of some antiquity. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 416.

merely (mēr'li), adv. [Formerly also merely; < ME. merely; < mere³ + ly².] 1. Absolutely; wholly; completely; utterly.

What gawds, catalles, Jewels, plate, ornaments, or other stuff, do merely belong or appertain to all the sayd promocious. English Bible (R. E. T. S.), p. 167.

I wish you all content, and am as happy In my friends' good as it were merely mine. Ben Jonson, Honest Man's Fortune, v. 3.

2. Simply; solely; only.

Exhausting his (Mahomet's) sensual follies in the life to come, as merely allegorically, and necessarily fitted to rude and vulgar capacities. Saunders, Traveller, p. 46.

The prayers are commonly performed merely as a matter of ceremony. R. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 212.

merenchyma (mē-rēng'ki-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μῆρος, a part, + (σάρξ) sarx, in med. sense 'parenchyma': see parenchyma.] In bot., an imperfect cellular tissue composed of more or less rounded cells and abundant in intercellular spaces. Coake.

merenchymatous (mēr-ēng-kim'g-tus), a. [< merenchyma (-t) + -ous.] Having the structure or appearance of merenchyma.

meresaucet, n. [< ME. meresauce; appar. < OF. mure (ML. muria), pickle, brine, + saucer, sauer. Cf. OF. saumure, pickle.] Brine or pickle for flesh or fish. Prompt. Parv., p. 334; Palgrave.

meresman (mēr'z-man), n. [Formerly also merismen, merismen. < mere³, poss. of mere², + man.] One who points out boundaries. [Obsolete or local.]

The use of the word "mere" has been revived in the measure of an Act of Parliament a few years since for ascertaining the boundaries of parishes. S. and Q., 7th ser., V. 291.

mere-stake (mēr'stak), n. A pollard or tree standing as a mark or boundary for the division of parts or parcels in coppices or woods. Also called mere-tree.

merestead (mēr'sted), n. [Formerly also merestead, merestead; < mere² + stead.] The land within a particular mere or boundary; a farm.

merestone (mēr'ston), n. [Formerly also merestone, merestane; < ME. mereston, merestane; < mere² + stone.] 1. A stone to mark a boundary.

The mislaid of a mere stone is to blame. But it is the unjust judge that is the capital remover of land-marks, when he deftly amises of lands and property. Bacon, Judicature.

2. Figuratively, a limit.

That you contain the jurisdiction of the court within the ancient merestones, without removing the mark. Bacon, Speech to Hutton (Works, XII. 202).

mereswinet, meerswinet, n. [ME. mereswynne, etc.; < OF. merswin, < mer¹ + swin.] A dolphin or porpoise.

Grassie as a mereswinet with woken full huge. Maria Arthur (L. E. T. S.), I. 1001.

mere-tree (mēr'trē), n. Same as mere-stake.

A mere tree, a tree which is for some bound or limit of land. Nomenclator (1563). (N and Q, 7th ser., V. 191.)

meretrician (mēr-ē-trish'ian), n. [= OF. meretrician, < L. meretrix (-trix), a prostitute, + -ian.] Of or pertaining to prostitutes; meretricious.

Take from human commerce meretrician amours. Tom Hovon, Works, III. 283. (Davies.)

meretricious (mēr-ē-trish'us), a. [= Sp. Pg. L. meretricio, < L. meretricius, of or pertaining to prostitutes, < meretrix, a prostitute: see meretrix.] 1. Of or pertaining to prostitutes; wanton; libidinous.

The meretricious world claps our cheeks, and fondles us into follies. Edmond, Roderick, I. 20.

Her deceitful and meretricious traffic with all the nations of the world. Sp. Hall, Hard Texts, I. xxi. 17.

2. Alluring by false attractions; having a gaudy but deceitful appearance; tawdry; showy; as, meretricious dress or ornaments.

Pride and artificial gluttonies do but adulterate nature, making our diet healthless, our appetites impatient and insatiable, and the taste mixed, fantastical, and meretricious. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, II. 6.

A tawdry carpet, all belov'd and befringed, such a meretricious blur of colors as a hotel offers for vulgar feet to tread upon. T. Whitworth, Cecil Dreams, xxxviii.

meretriciously (mēr-ē-trish'us-li), adv. In a meretricious manner; with false allurements; tawdri-ly; with vulgar show.

meretriciousness (mēr-ē-trish'us-nēs), n. The quality of being meretricious; false show or allurements; vulgar finery.

meretrix (mēr'e-triks), n. [L., a prostitute, < merere, earn, gain, serve for pay: see merit.] 1. A prostitute; a harlot.

A beautiful piece, Eight Aspada, the meretrix. B. Jonson, Volpone, I. 1.

That she Cynthia was a meretrix is clear from many indications—her accomplishments, her house in the Subura. Kings, Brit., XIX. 818.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of bivalves: same as Cytherea. Lamarck, 1799.

Merganetta (mēr-gan-et'g), n. [NL., < Mergus + Gr. petra, a duck.] A remarkable genus of Anatida, combining characters of mergansers with those of ordinary ducks, and having furthermore a sharp spur on the bend of the wing; the torrent-ducks. See torrent-duck.

Merganettina (mēr-gan-et'g), n. pl. [NL., < Merganetta + -ina.] A subfamily of Anatida constituted by the genus Merganetta.

merganser (mēr-gan'ser), n. [NL. (> Sp. mergansar), < L. mergas, a diver (water-fowl), + anser, goose: see Mergus and Anser.] 1. A bird of the genus Mergus or subfamily Mergina, family Anatida; a sawbill, garbill, or fishing-duck.

Hooded Merganser (Lophodytes cucullatus).

A merganser resembles a duck, but has a more pointed bill, with a hooked end at the end, and a serration of very prominent back-out teeth. Several species are among the common water-fowls of the northern hemisphere. The common merganser or goosander, Mergus americanus, is about 2 feet long, and nearly 2 in extent of wings. In the male the upper parts are black varied with white on the wings, the lower parts white tinged with salmon-color, the head and neck glossy dark green like a drake's, and the bill and feet coral- or vermilion-red. The head is slightly crested. The red-breasted merganser, M. serrator, is a similar but somewhat smaller bird, with a reddish breast and the head more decidedly crested. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus, is still smaller, black and white, with a beautiful erect semi-circular crest. A South American species, distinct from any of the foregoing, is Mergus brasiliensis.

2. [cap.] A genus of Mergina: same as Mergus.

merge (mérj), v.; pret. and pp. merged, pp. merging. [*< OF. merger, mergur = L. mergere, < L. mergere, dive, dip, immerse, sink in, = Skt. √ nuj, dip, bathe. Hence emerge, immerge, submerge, immerse, etc.*] 1. intrans. To sink or disappear in something else; be swallowed up; lose identity or individuality: with in.

He is to take care, undoubtedly, that the ecclesiastical shall not merge in the former. Scott, Speech, April, 1802.

Fear, doubt, thought, life itself, are long Merged in one feeling deep and strong. Whittier, Mogg Megone, II.

II. trans. To cause to be absorbed or engrossed; sink the identity or individuality of; make to disappear in something else: followed by in (sometimes by into): as, all fear was merged in curiosity.

The plaintiff became the purchaser and merged his term in the fee. Chancellor's Court.

The names of Castilian and Aragonese were merged in the comprehensive one of Spanish. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II. 28.

merger¹ (mēr'jēr), n. [< merge + -er.] One who or that which merges.

merger² (mēr'jēr), n. [< OF. merger, inf. as noun, a merging: see merge.] 1. In the law of conveyancing, the sinking or obliteration of a lesser estate in lands, etc., resulting when it is transferred without qualification to the owner of a greater estate in the same property (or the like transfer of the greater estate to the owner of the lesser), if there be no intermediate estate. At common law the lesser estate was not deemed to be added to the greater, but to be extinguished, so as to free the greater estate from the qualification or impairment which the existence of the lesser estate had constituted. Thus, if an owner of the fee of land on which there was an outstanding lease, owned by another person, acquired the lease, the lease was thereby annulled, and he thereafter held simply as owner of the fee. It resulted sometimes that if his title to the fee proved defective, he could not avail himself of any claim under the lease.

Merger the act of law, and is the annihilation of one estate in another. Its effect is to consolidate two estates, and to conform them into one estate. Cooper, On Merger, I. 1.

2. In the law of contracts, the extinguishment of a security for a debt by the creditor's acceptance of a higher security, such as a bond in lieu of a note, or a judgment in lieu of either: so called because such acceptance, by operation of law, and without intention of the parties, merges the lower security.

mergh, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of mergine.

Mergina (mēr-jī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mergus + -ina.] A subfamily of Anatida, typified by the genus Mergus: the mergansers. See merganser.

Mergulus (mēr-gū-lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), dim. of Mergus, q. v.] A genus of small three-toed web-footed marine birds of the auk family, Alcidae; the dovekeys. There is but one species, M. alle. Also called Alle. See cut under dovekie.

Mergus (mēr'gus), n. [NL., < L. mergus, a diver (water-fowl), < mergere, dive: see merge.] The typical genus of Mergina, formerly co-extensive with the subfamily, now restricted to such species as the goosander, M. merganser, and the red-breasted merganser, M. serrator. See merganser.

meri (mā'ri), n. A war-ax or war-club used by the natives of New Zealand. It is seldom less than a foot or more than 15 inches long, and is made of wood, bone, basaltic stone or green jade.

merisum (mē-rī-ē-um), n.; pl. meria (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μῆριον, neut. of μῆριος, belonging to the thigh, < μῆρ, the thigh: see mere³.] In entom., a posterior inflected part of the metasternum of beetles, forming the anterior surface of the socket of the hind leg. Knoch.

Meriania (mer-i-an'g), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1800), named after M. S. Merian, a Dutch artist.] A genus of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae, type of the tribe Meriantes. There are about 2 leaves, surface of tropical America and the West Indies. They are erect shrubs or trees with long-petioled oblong-lanceolate leaves and large yellow or purple flowers. Some of the species are cultivated in greenhouses, under the name of Joubaria rosea.

Merianthium (mer-i-an-tyūm), n. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Meriania + -anthium.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Molastomaceae and the suborder Molastomaeae, characterized by the generally terete or slightly angular capsular fruit and the angulate, cuneate, or fusiform seeds. It embraces 11 genera and about 107 species of tropical American shrubs and trees.

mericarp (mer-i-kärp), n. [= F. mericarpe, < Gr. méros, a part, + karpos, fruit.] One of the two achene-like carpels which form a cremocarp or fruit in the Umbelliferae; same as hemisperm.

meridea, n. Plural of meris.

Meridiaceae (mē-rīd-i-ā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Rabenhorst, 1864), < Meridium + -aceae.] A large family of diatoms, according to the classification of Rabenhorst, taking its name from the genus Meridium. The frustule is cuneate, producing fan-shaped colonies, without central nodule. They live in both fresh and salt water. The family is the same or nearly the same as the Meridiales of Kuetzing.

Meridial (mē-rīd-i-āl), a. [ME. meridyall; < LL. meridialis, of midday; < meridies, midday; see meridian.] Of midday; meridian.

Whole men of what age or complexion so ever they be of, should take their natural rest and sleep in the night; and to catchew meridyall sleep.

Hebrew Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 244.

Meridian (mē-rīd-i-an), a. and n. [< ME. meridian, < OF. meridien, < F. meridien = Sp. Pg. el meridiano, < L. meridianus, of or belonging to midday or to the south, southern, < meridies, midday, the south, orig. "medies, < medius, middle, + diēs, day; see medium, mid, and diat.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to midday or noon; noonday; as, the meridian sun; the sun's meridian heat or splendor.

In what place that any manner man ys at any time of the year when that the sunne by moving of the firmament cometh to his verrey meridian place, than is hit verrey Midday, that we clepen owre noon, as to thilke man, and therefore is it cleped the lyne of midday.

Chaucer, Astrolobe, ll. 530.

Towards heaven and the full blazing sun,

Which now sat high in his meridian tower.

Milton, P. L., lv, 30.

The sun rode high in the heavens, and its meridian blaze was powerfully felt. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, l. 181.

2. Pertaining to the culmination or highest point or degree (the sun being highest at midday): culminating; highest before a decline; as, Athens reached its meridian glory in the age of Pericles.—3. Pertaining to or marking a geographical north and south line; extending in the arc of a great circle passing through the poles; as, a meridian circle on an artificial globe.—4. Noting the eighth of Professor H. Rogers's twelve divisions of the Paleozoic series in the Appalachian chain of North America, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day; it corresponds with the Oriskany sandstone (which see, under sandstone).—5. Consummate; complete.

An effrontery out of the mouth of a meridian villain.

Roger North, Examen, p. 146. (Davies.)

Meridian altitude of a star. See altitude.—Meridian line on a dial, the twelve o'clock hour-line.

II. n. 1. Midday; noon.—2. Midday repose or indulgence; noon: used specifically as in the quotations.

We have . . . in the course of this our toilsome journey, lost our meridian (th. hour of repose) at noon, which in the middle ages was employed in slumber, and which the monks' rules of nocturnal vigils rendered necessary.

Scott, Monastery, xix.

Flounders joined the other two gentlemen in drinking the meridian (a bumper-dram of brandy).

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, lv.

8. The highest point reached before a decline; the culmination; the point of greatest increment or development.

You seem to me I do not marry all this while, considering that I am past the meridian of my age.

Hawell, Letters, l. vi, m.

In the meridian of Edward's age and vigor.

Hallam, Middle Ages, iii, 4.

4. A great circle of a sphere passing through the poles, or the half of such a circle included between the poles; in geom., such a circle drawn upon the earth; in astron., such a circle on the celestial sphere. The meridian of a place on the earth's surface is the great circle passing through it and the poles, or the great circle of the celestial sphere passing through the pole and the zenith of the place. See longitude.

5. Figuratively, the state or condition (in any respect) of the people of one place or region, or of persons in one sphere or plane of existence, as compared with those of or in another; as, the institutions or customs of Asia are not anted to the meridian of Europe.

All other knowledge merely serves the concerns of this life, and is fitted to the meridian thereof.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

First or prime meridian, the meridian from which longitude is reckoned, as that of Greenwich. See longitude 2.

Magnetic meridian of any place, a great circle the plane of which passes through that place and the line of direction of the horizontal magnetic needle. The angle which the magnetic makes with the true geographical meridian is different in different places and at different times, and is called the magnetic declination or the variation of the compass. See declination, and agnetic line (under agnetic).

Meridian of a globe, a meridian drawn upon a globe, especially, a brass circle concentric with the globe, and having the axis of rotation of the globe fixed in the plane of one of its faces.—Secondary meridian, in geom., a meridian whose longitude from the prime meridian has been so well determined that trustworthy longitude may be ascertained by measuring from it.

Meridian-circle (mē-rīd-i-an-sēr-kl), n. An astronomical instrument consisting of a telescope with cross wires and moving in the plane of the meridian, and provided with a graduated circle. The meridian circle subserves the same purposes as the transit-instrument, and also determines the declination of stars.

Meridian-mark (mē-rīd-i-an-märk), n. A mark placed exactly north or south of a transit instrument at a considerable distance, to aid in adjusting the instrument in the meridian. It is sometimes placed near, with a lens interposed to render the rays from it parallel as if it were really remote.

Meridies (mē-rīd-i-ēs), n. [L.; see meridian.] Meridian; mid-point. [Rare.]

About the hour that Cynthia's silver light

Had touch'd the pale meridies of the night.

Cowley, Essays (Agriculture).

Meridion (mē-rīd-i-on), n. [NL. (Agardh, 1824), < Gr. méridon, a small part, dim. of méros, a part.] A genus of diatoms with cuneate frustule, typical of the family Meridiaceae of Rabenhorst.

Meridional (mē-rīd-i-on-āl), a. [< ME. meridional, < OF. meridional, F. meridional = Fr. Sp. Pg. meridional = It. meridionale, < L. meridionalis, of midday; < L. meridies, midday; see meridian.] 1. Pertaining to the meridian; having a direction like that of a terrestrial meridian.

The meridional lines stand whiter upon one . . . to then the other.

Sir T. Browne, Garden, l. Cyru, iv.

Along one side of this body is a meridional groove, resembling that of a peach. W. B. Carpenter, Micros, § 197.

2. Highest; consummate.

The meridional brightness, the glorioman and height, is to be a Christian.

Duns, Sermons, xlvii.

3. Southern; southerly; extending or turned toward the south.

Ethiopia is reported in 2 princely parts, and that is, in the 1st partle and in the Meridionale partle, the whole partle meridionale is clept Montane.

Maunder, Travels, p. 150.

The which lyne . . . is cleped the south lyne, or the lyne meridional.

Chaucer, Astrolobe, l. 4.

4. Characteristic of southern climates or southern peoples.

A dark meridional physiognomy

Molloy, United Netherlands, l. 130.

Meridional distance, see distance. Meridional parts, the distance of any given latitude from the equator upon Mercator's map-projection expressed in minutes of the equator. Neglecting the compression the meridional parts are proportional to the integral of the secant of the latitude, which is the logarithm of the tangent of half the polar distance. Taking account of the compression the secant of the latitude must be divided before integrating by $1 + e^2 \cos^2 \phi$ (where ϕ is the latitude and e the ellipticity of the meridian).

Meridionality (mē-rīd-i-on-āl-i-tē), n. [< meridional + -ity.] 1. The state of being meridional or on the meridian.—2. Position in the south; aspect toward the south.

Meridionally (mē-rīd-i-on-āl-i), adv. [< meridional + -ly.] In the direction of the meridian; north and south.

Who (the Jews) reverentially declining the situation of their Temple, nor willing to lie as that stood, did place their beds from north to south, and delight to sleep meridionally.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ll. 3.

Merihedric (mer-i-hē-drik), a. [< Gr. méros, a part, + hēdros, a seat, base.] Pertaining to some part of the faces of a polyhedron, taken according to some regular system.

Merist, n. See merist.

meringue (mē-rang'), n. [F., said to be < Mehring, a town in Germany.] In cookery, a mixture of white of eggs and sugar slightly browned, used for ornamenting and supplmenting other confections. Puddings or tarts, etc., covered with this preparation are sometimes called meringues.—Meringue glacé, ice-cream served with a coating of meringue.

merino (mē-rē-nō), a. and n. [= F. mérinos = Pg. merino, merino (sheep), < Sp. merino, deriving from pasture to pasture (said of sheep), < merino, an inspector of sheepwalks, a shepherd of merino sheep, also a royal judge, < ML. majorinus (used in Spain), the head of a village, a steward, majordomo; cf. majoralis, a chief, in Spain a head shepherd, < L. major, greater, in ML. a head, chief, etc.; see major, mayor.] 1. a. 1. Noting a variety of sheep from Spain, or their wool. See below.—2. Made of the wool of the merino sheep; as, merino stockings or underclothing. The articles so designated are usually made with an admixture of cotton to prevent shrinkage.

Merino sheep, a variety of sheep originally peculiar to Spain, but now introduced into many other countries. They are valued chiefly for the sake of their long fine wool, the mutton being but little esteemed. In summer the Spanish sheep feed upon the elevated lands of Biscay, Navarre, and Aragon, and toward winter are driven southward to the fertile plains of New Castile, Andalusia, and Extremadura.

II. n. 1. A merino sheep.—2. A thin woolen cloth, twilled on both sides and used especially for women's dresses, now to some extent superseded by cashmere. It was originally made of the wool of the merino sheep. There is a variety which has an admixture of silk.

3. A variety of tricet or knitted material for undergarments. [U. S.]

merion (mē-rē-on), n. [= F. mérion, < NL. Merionex, q. v.] A book-name of the deer-mouse or jumping mouse of North America, Zapus hudsonius, formerly placed in the genus Merionex under the name of M. hudsonicus. See cut under deer-mouse, 1.

Meriones (mē-rē-on-ēs), n. [NL., so called with ref. to the development of the hind legs (cf. Gr. Méromys, a man's name, composition of Idome-neus, < Gr. méros, thigh bone, < μῆρος, thigh.)] A genus of palliatorial myomorph rodents. The name has been applied: (a) By Illiger, 1811, to the Old World jerboa; a synonym of Dipus. (b) By Fied. Cuvier, 1825, to a different genus of American jumping mice, now called Zapus. (Dissolved in both senses.)

meris (mē-ris), n.; pl. merides (rī-dēs). [NL., < F. mēris (Portier), < Gr. méros (pépōs), a part.] A permanent colony of cells or plastids, which may remain isolated or may multiply by gemination to form higher aggregates called demes. See deme and zoid. Eucy. Biol., xvi, 842.

merismatic (mē-ris-mat'ik), a. [< Gr. méros, a part, < μῆρος, a division, < μερίζω, divide, < μερῖν, a part; see merit.] In biol., dividing by the formation of internal partitions; taking place by internal partition into cells or segments.

Merismatic cells, remaining without function sometimes for several years, until the sap wood containing them becomes dry or heart wood, when they begin their activity.

Pop. Sci. Mo., xxviii, 606.

merispore (mē-ris-pōr), n. [< Gr. méros, a part, < μῆρος, a division, < σπορά, seed.] One of the individual cells or secondary spores of a pluricellular (separate or compound) spore.

meristem (mē-ris-tēm), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μέριστος, verbal adj. of μερίζω, divide, < μερῖν, a part.] Actively dividing cell-tissue; the unformed and growing cell-tissue found at the ends of young stems, leaves, and roots. In structure the cells of the meristem are characterized by having a delicate homogeneous membrane, which is only rarely thickened, and homogeneous granular protoplasm with a nucleus. It is distinguished as primary meristem when it forms the first foundation of a member, or the cells which develop into the various tissue-elements, and which ordinarily soon lose the power of independent growth, and secondary meristem, in which the tissue elements retain during their life the properties of typical cells, consisting of a closed cell membrane with active protoplasm, a nucleus, and cell contents. They retain the power of independent growth, and a meristem may arise from them at any time.

meristemetic (mer-'is-tē-mat-'ik), a. [meristem + -etic.] Consisting of or pertaining to the meristem.

meristematically (mer-'is-tē-mat-'i-kal-i), adv. After the manner of meristem.

The caudal region is moderate and coniform behind; the caudal rays are procurent forward; the anus is submedian, the sub-orbital bones are moderate; the mouth is terminal; the ventral fins are subjugular; the dorsal fin is double, a short anterior and a long posterior one; there is a long anal fin corresponding to the second dorsal; the ribs are wide, approximated and channelled below, or with indented sides; and there are paired excavated frontal bones with divergent crests continuous from the forked occipital crest. The family includes the English hake and related fishes.

Merlucine (mër-lū'si-in), n. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Merlucciidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A gadoid fish of the family Merlucciidae. Merluccius (mër-lū'si-oid), n. Like a hake; or of pertaining to the Merlucciidae.

Merlucius (mër-lū'si-us), n. [NL., < F. merluce, merlus, OF. merlus, merlus (= Sp. merluza = It. merluzzo, the hake), dried haddock, < merlus, haddock, according to Ménage; < L. maris luctus, ocean pike; maris, gen. of mare, the sea; luctus, a fish, perhaps the pike: see lucet.] A genus of fishes represented by the common hake of Europe, M. americanus or vulgaris, and type of the family Merlucciidae. Also spelled Merluccius.

Mermaid (mër'māid), n. [ME. mermayde, mermayde; < merel + maid. (Cf. mermaid.) A fabled marine or amphibian creature having the form of a woman above the waist and that of a fish below, endowed with human attributes, and usually working harm, with or without malignant intent, to mortals with whom she might be thrown into relation.

Chauntecleer so free Sang merrier than the mermaid in the sea. Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 450.

And as for the mermaid called Nereides it is no fabulous tale that goeth of them; for looke, how painters draw them, so they are indeed. Holland, tr. of Pliny, ix. 3.

Who would be A mermaid fair, Singing alone, Combing her hair Under the sea? Tennyson, The Mermaid.

False mermaid, the Florkia pinnatifida, an inconspicuous annual plant of the northern United States, resembling the mermaid weed. - Mermaid lace, a fine Venetian point-lace. - Mermaid's fish-lines, a common seaweed, Chorda filum; so called from its cord-like appearance. See Chorda, 2.

Mermaid (mër'mā'id), n. [ME. mermaid, mermayden, mermaid; < merel + maid. (Cf. mermaid.) A mermaid; a siren.

case or ovi-capsule of a skate, ray, or shark. Also called sea-purse and sea-burrow.

These cases are frequently found on the sea shore, and are called mermaid's-purses. Forrell, British Fishes.

Mermaid-weed (mër'māid-wēd), n. A plant of the genus Proserpinaca, which consists of the marsh-herbs of North America and the West Indies, having comb-toothed leaves and inconspicuous flowers.

Mermaid-lade, n. An obsolete form of mermaid-lade.

Merman (mër'man), n.; pl. mermen (-men). [*Early mod. E. also merman, mereman; < ME. merman (= D. merman = G. merman); < merel + man. (Cf. mermin and mermaid.) 1. A fabulous man of the sea, with the lower part of the body that of a fish.

A thing tumbling in the sea we spide Like to a merman. John Taylor, Works, ll. 22. (Nares)

2. In her., same as triton.

Mermin (mër'mi-an), n. [< Mermin + -an.] A land-hairworm of the family Merminidae or Merminidae. In their early stages these worms are parasitic in the visceral cavities of insects, and the young are able to move over the ground or even on trees during heavy dews or in wet weather.

Mermin, n. [ME., also mermyne, pl. merminnen, < merminne, < AS. meremennan, meremennan, f. (= MD. merminne, merminne); f. = MLA. merminne = OHG. meremman, meremenni, meremni, mermin, n., merminni, merminna, f. (= MLG. merminni, merminni); f. = mermin, = (with additional suffix) leel. merminni, merminni (mod. merminni), also marmelli = Norw. marmel, a sea-goldfish; < merel, sea, + mennen, form. of man, mann, man; see merel and man, and cf. merman.] A mermaid or merman.

The coat of Rome is [now] mermin in likeness of men and of women. Trevisa, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon.

They beo funder the merminnen That beoth deor of nuchle ginnun. Lagamon, l. 24.

Mermis (mër'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. mēmis, a cord, string.] The typical genus of Mermithidae. M. nigrescens and M. albuscens are examples.

Mermithidae (mër-mith'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mermis (Mermis) + -idae.] A family of nematoid worms, typified by the genus Mermis, belonging to the order Gordiacea; the land-hair-worms. They are apterous Nematodes with a very long filiform body and six oral papillae, the male having two papillae and three rows of papillae on the broadened caudal region. The worms in their larval state are parasitic, like the true gordians, being found in the bodies of various insects. When mature they live in the ground, and sometimes ascend to the surface in such numbers as to give rise to the vulgar belief that it has rained worms. Also Mermithidae.

Meroblast (mër'ō-blāst), n. [< Gr. mēros, a part (see merel), + blastē, a germ.] In embryol., a meroblastic ovum; an egg or ovum containing food-yolk or nutritive protoplasm besides the formative or germinal protoplasm; distinguished from holoblast.

Meroblastic (mër'ō-blāst'ik), n. [< meroblast + -ic.] In embryol., partially germinal; applied by Kemak to those eggs in which there is much food-yolk which does not undergo segmentation or take part in germination: opposed to holoblastic. Birds, reptiles, most fishes, and most invertebrates have meroblastic eggs.

Merocels (mër'ō-sēl), n. [< Gr. mēros, thigh, + celē, tumor.] Femoral hernia. See Aequi.

Merocerite (mër'ō-sēl), n. [< Gr. mēros, thigh, + ceras, horn, + -ite.] In Crustacea, one of the joints of an antenna, borne upon the ischiocerite. See antenna.

Meroceritic (mër'ō-sēl'it'ik), n. [< merocerite + -ic.] Of the nature of a merocerite.

Merogastrula (mër'ō-gāstr'ul-ā), n.; pl. merogastrula (-lā). [NL., < Gr. mēros, a part, + NL. gastrula, q. v.] The gastrula, of whatever form, of a meroblastic egg. It is a discogastrula if the partial segmentation is discoidal, a paragastrula if the segmentation is superficial as well as partial.

Merogenesis (mër'ō-jen'ē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. mēros, a part, + genesis, generation: see genesis.] In biol., segmentation; origination of the segments of which an organized body may consist. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 183.

Merogenetic (mër'ō-jen'ē-t'ik), n. [< merogenesis, after genesis.] Pertaining to, characterized by, or exhibiting merogenesis.

Merohedral (mër'ō-hēdr'al), n. [< Gr. mēros, a part, + hēdrā, seat, base, + -al.] In crystal, same as hemihedral.

Merohedism (mër'ō-hēdr'izim), n. [As merohedra + -ism.] Same as hemihedism.

Merolistic (mër'ō-lis't'ik), n. [< Gr. mēros, a part, + erō, egg (ovum), + -istic.] Secreting not only ova, but also vitelligenous cells; applied to the ovaries of insects. See panolistic.

Dr. A. Brandt has proposed the term panolistic for ovaries of the first mode, and merolistic for those of the second and third modes of development. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 221.

Meromorph (mër'ō-mōrf), n. Same as meromorphic.

Meromorphic (mër'ō-mōrf'ik), n. [< Gr. mēros, part, fraction, + morphe, form.] Similar in nature to a rational fraction. - Meromorphic function, in the theory of functions, a function which, as long as the variable remains within a certain part of the plane of imaginary quantity within which the function is said to be meromorphic, varies continuously, has a derivative, and is biholomorphic except in going round certain points or isolated values of the variable called poles, at which the function becomes infinite. The function is, therefore, of the nature of a fraction whose numerator and denominator may be infinite series. An older name is fractionary function.

Meromyaria (mër'ō-mī-ā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. mēros, a part, + mya, a muscle, + -aria.] One of the three principal divisions of the Nematomorpha, containing those threadworms which have only eight longitudinal series of muscle-cells, two between each dorsal and ventral line and lateral area respectively. See Polymyaria, Holomyaria.

Meromyarian (mër'ō-mī-ā-ri-an), n. [< Meromyaria + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Meromyaria.

Meroparonymy (mër'ō-pā-rōn'i-mi), n. [< Gr. mēros, a part, + paronymia, paronymy: see paronymy.] Partial paronymy; adoption or naturalization of a Latin or Greek word in only one or two modern languages. Duck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VII. 519. [Harr.]

Meropidae (mër'ō-pī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Merops + -idae.] An Old World family of temnostratal peccary birds, typified by the genus Merops; the bee-eaters or apinators. They have the feet not trochyl, the bill long, slender, and acute, the sternum four notched behind, the carotid single, the claudoductus wide, and a spinal aperture. The range of the family is extensive, including the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australasian regions. The family contains upward of 30 species, divided into several genera, and by Gray into five families, Nyctiarthra and Meropinae. See out under bee-eater.

Meropidan (mër'ō-pī-dan), n. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Meropidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A bird of the family Meropidae.

Meropine (mër'ō-pī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Merops + -ine.] The leading subfamily of Meropidae, containing nearly all the species.

Meropodite (mër'ō-pōd'it), n. [< Gr. mēros, thigh, + podē (pōdē) = F. foot, + -ite.] The fourth joint of a developed endopodite, between the ischiopodite and the carpopodite. See out under endopodite.

Meropoditic (mër'ō-pōd'it'ik), n. [< meropodite + -ic.] Of the nature of a meropodite; as, the meropoditic segment of the leg.

Merops (mēr'ōps), n. [NL., < L. merops, < Gr. mēros, a bird, the bee-eater, appar. the same as mēros, speaking, endowed with speech, < mēros, a part, μειρμα, divide, + ōp, voice.] The typical genus of Meropidae. Birds of this genus are of like and slender form, somewhat like that of the swallow, which they also resemble in their mode of flight. The bill is long and slender, the wings are long and pointed, the tail has the two middle feathers lengthened, and the plumage is beautifully variegated with bright colors. They prey on insects, especially bees, wasps, and other hymenoptera, which they capture on the wing. There are several species, the best-known of which is M. apidator, the only one of general distribution in Europe, though a second, M. cyllene, is also found in parts of Europe. See bee eater. Also called Apidator.

merorganization (mer'-o-r-gan-i-zā'shon), n. [Gr. mēros, part, + k. organization.] Organization in part, or partial organization. [Itare.] meros, merus (mē'-ros, -rus), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, thigh.] 1. In zool., one of the joints of a maxilliped.—2. In anat., the thigh, femur, or femoral segment of the hind limb, extending from the hip to the knee, and corresponding to the brachium of the fore limb.

merosomal (mer'-o-sō-māl), a. [merosom + -al.] Of the nature of a merosome.

merosome (mer'-o-sō-m), n. [Gr. μέρος, a part, + σώμα, body.] In zool., one of the definite successive parts or segments of which the body is composed; a metamere; a somite. Thus, one of the rays of a starfish, or one of the rings of a worm or crustacean, is a merosome.

Merostomata (mer'-o-stō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + στόμα, mouth.] A group of articulated animals to which various values and limits have been assigned. (a) Named by De Meek as an order of crustaceans, containing the horseshoe-crabs, together with certain heteropodous forms. (b) Extended to the Limulidae and the Eurypteridae. (c) Extended to the Limulidae, Eurypteridae, and Trilobitidae, as a class of crustaceans, synonymous with Digammatraea and with Palaeoscoleca. (d) Having the same limits as (c), but associated with the Arachnida. (e) Restricted, as an order of crustaceans, to the Limulidae, synonymous with Xiphosura. (f) Restricted, as an order of Digammatraea, to the Eurypteridae, and synonymous therewith. See Palaeopoda. Hemastomatidae is a synonym.

merostomatous (mer'-o-stō-mā-tūs), a. [Merostomata + -ous.] Pertaining to the Merostomata, or having their characters.

merostome (mer'-o-stō-m), n. One of the Merostomata, as a trilobite or a horseshoe-crab.

merostomous (mer'-o-stō-mūs), a. [merostome + -ous.] Same as merostomatous.

merous. [Gr. μέρος, combining form of μέρος, a part.] A suffix denoting 'parted,' 'divided into parts': often used in botany with a numerical prefix, as 2-merous, 3-merous, etc., to be read dimorous, trimorous, etc., according to the Greek.

Merovingian (mer'-o-vin'-ji-an), a. and n. [= F. Mérovingien, < ML. Merovingi, the descendants of Merovech, an ancestor of the founder of the dynasty, < *OHG. Merowig or Merwig.] 1. a. Taking name from Merowig or Merwig (L. Merovech), an alleged chief or king of a part of the Salian Franks and grandfather of Clovis; as, the Merovingian race, dynasty, or period. Clovis, invading the Roman part of Gaul in A. D. 486, founded the Merovingian, or first race of French kings (several often reigning at the same time in different parts of France), which was succeeded by the Carolingian dynasty in 751 or 752. Some suppose Merowig or Merovech to have been the patronymic of the family or clan of Clovis, derived from a more remote ancestor. 2. Merovingian writing, a variety of cursive script full of flourishes and difficult embellishments and combinations of letters, peculiar to the Merovingian period in France, used in many documents still in existence.

The writing of the Frankish empire to which the title of Merovingian has been applied had a wider range than the other national hands. It had a long career both for diplomatic and literary purposes. In this writing, as it appears in documents, we see that the Roman cursive is subjected to a lateral pressure, so that the letters revolved a seriously cramped appearance, while the heads and tails are exaggerated to inordinate length.

Knege, Hist., XVIII, 187.

II. n. A member of the family to which the first dynasty of French kings belonged. See I. merozone (mē'-rō-zōn), n. [Gr. μέρος, a part, + ζών, strange, foreign.] A variety of the kind of mica called biotite, distinguished by its optical characters. See biotite and mica. The name was early given by Brethaupt to the Vesuvian biotite, but has recently been limited by Tschermak to those kinds of biotite in which the optic axial plane is parallel to the plane of symmetry.

merpeople (mēr'-pō-pl), n. pl. [Gr. μέρος, (in mermaid, merman) + people.] Fabled inhabitants of the sea with a human body and a fish-like tail; a collective name for mermaids and mermen. Atl. Forum, III, 85.

merret, v. t. A Middle English form of marl. merri (mēr'-i), c. t.; pret. and pp. merried, ppr. merriying. [Gr. μέρι + -i.] To enno to be or become merry. [Rare.]

It merried us all

Mme. D. Arday, Mary, I, 334. (Devon.)

merri (mēr'-i), adv. [ME. merily, merily; < merry + -ly.] In a merry, cheerful, or glad manner; with mirth and jollity.

merrimake (mēr'-i-māk), n. and v. See merry-make.

merriment (mēr'-i-ment), n. [Gr. μέρι + -ment.] 1. The state of being merry or frolicsome; hilarious enjoyment; jollity; as, boisterous merriment.

Yet was there not with her else any one,
That to her might move cause of merriment.

Spenser, F. Q., II, vi, 3.

His deep eye laughter-stir'd
With merriment of kingly jollie

Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

2. The act of making merry; mirthful entertainment; frolic.

A number of merriments and jests . . . wherewith they have pleasantly moved much laughter at our manner of serving God.

Wilson, L'Allegro, I, 93.

2. Playfully cheerful or gay; enlivened with gladness or good spirits; mirthful in speech or action; frolicsome; hilarious; jubilant; as, a merry company.

On that still side he was one of the best fellows and merriest that might be founde.

Melton (E. B. T. S.), II, 136.

He merry, he merry, my wife has all
For women are shrews both short and tall;
His merry in all, when heads wag all.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v, 3, 35 (song).

He merry, sister; I shall make you laugh anon.

R. L. Benson, Cynthia's Revels, v, 2.

3. Sportive and mirthful in quality or character; jocular; jovial; rollicking; funny; as, a merry heart; a merry song.

This ruling rime serveth most aptly to write a merie tale, so Rhythme royall is fittest for a graue discourse

Gower, Notes on Eng. Verse (ed. Arber), § 18.

But when on us we woids were fyt,
The mo the merrier so god me bleese.

Albion's Poems (ed. Morris), I, 644.

To make merry, to be jovial; indulge in festivity and mirth. See merry.—Byn, I, 2. North's, Jostel, etc. (see jolly), gleeful.

merry (mēr'-i), v. t. [Gr. μέρι + a.] To make merry or glad; please; gratify; delight. [Rare.]

Though pleasure merries the senses for a while, yet hur-ror after vultures the unconsumed heart.

Fellham, Resolves, p. 43.

merry (mēr'-i), adv. [ME. mery, murye; < mery + a.] Merrily; in a lively manner.

Danforth he murye that is mytheles?

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, I, 302.

merry (mēr'-i), n. [Orig. "meris", then merries, applied as a plural to the fruit, whence the sing. merry; < F. merise, wild cherry; origin uncertain. Cf. cherry, ult. < F. cerise, cherry.] The wild cherry of England, Prunus avium.

merry-andrew (mēr'-i-an'-drō), n. [Gr. μέρι + Andrew, a man's name; see Andrew.] The name Andrew may refer to some buffoon of that name, of whom nothing is now known (of a similar use of some man's name in smart Aleck, a slang term for a would-be smart fellow), or it may be a general appellation like zany, a merry-andrew, ult. identical with John. There appears to be no evidence for the asser-tion (appar. first made by Hearne) that the name orig. referred to Andrew Boorde, doctor of physie in the reign of Henry VIII., the author of the "Introduction to Knowledge" and other works, and to whom several jest-books were erroneously ascribed (perhaps because of his surname, which recalls ME. boorde, borde, bourde, a jest; see bourd).] One whose business it is to make sport for others by jokes and ridiculous posturing; a buffoon; a clown.

The Italian Merry Andrews took their place,
And quite debauch'd the Stage with lewd grimaces.

Dryden, Epit. to Univ. of Oxford (1673), I, 11.

merrybought, n. [Formerly also merriboucke; appar. < merry + bought.] A cold posset.

A sillibub or merriboucke.

Cotgrave.

merry-go-down (mēr'-i-gō-down'), n. Strong ale, or huff-cap. [Old cant.]

I present you with meate, and you . . . can do no less than present mee with the best morning's draught of merry-go-downe in your quarters.

Nashe, Lenten Stuffe, Ded. (Harl. Misc., VI, 146).

merry-go-round (mēr'-i-gō-round'), n. A revolving machine, consisting of a series of wooden horses or carriage-seats, mounted on a circular platform, on or in which children and sometimes grown persons ride for amusement. In the United States also called a carrousel.

merry-maid (mēr'-i-māid), n. A dialectal form of mermaid. [Cornwall, Eng.] merrymake (mēr'-i-māk), c. t.; pret. and pp. merrymade, ppr. merrymaking. [Also merrimake; < merry + make.] To make merry; frolic.

With thee 'twas Marian's dear delight
To mull all day, and merrymake at night.

Gay, Shepherd's Week, Tuesday.

The weak and wronged shall all with me,
And eat and drink, and merrymake and go,
Singing a holiday for every one.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII, 180.

merrymake (mēr'-i-māk), n. [Gr. μέρι + make, v.] A merrymaking; sport; pastime. Also written merrimake.

But when he saw her toy, and gibe, and geare,
And passe the honde of modest merrymake,
Her dalliance he despis'd and faggles did forsake.

Spenser, F. Q., II, vi, 21.

We'll have feasts,
And funerals also, merrymakes and wars.

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

merrymaking (mēr'-i-mā'-king), n. The act of making merry; a convivial entertainment; a gay festival.

Is this a place for mirthful cheer?
Can merry-making enter here?

Wordsworth, Master of Jeddborough.

merrymaking (mēr'-i-mā'-king), a. Producing mirth or sport.

His talents lending to exalt the freaks
Of merry-making beggars . . . provided
To laughter multiplied in louder peals
By his malicious wit.

Wordsworth, Excursion, vi.

merryman (mēr'-i-man), n. A dialectal form of merman. [Cornwall, Eng.] merryman (mēr'-i-man), n.; pl. merry-men. A merry-andrew; a buffoon; a clown; used as an appellative or pretended surname for a clown; as, Mr. Merryman.

merry-making (mer'i-ku'-ing), n. A meeting for mirth or sport; a merry-making; a festival.

The studious man prefers a book before a revel, the rigorous of contemplation before merry-making and jolly company.
South, Sermons, VIII. 604.

merry-night (mer'i-nit), n. A rural festival held in the north of England, where young people meet in the evening for the purpose of dancing.

He hears a sound, and sees the light,
And in a moment calls to mind
That 'tis the village Merry-Night!

Wordsworth, The Waggoner.

merrythought (mer'i-thát), n. The furcula or wishbone of a fowl's breast: so called from the sport of breaking it between two persons of whom each pulls at one of the two ends, to determine which is to be married first, or which is to have a wish gratified that has been mentally formed for the occasion, the winner being the one who gets the longer fragment.

I have known the shooting of a star spoil a night's rest; and have seen a man in love grow pale, and lose his appetite, upon the plucking of a merry-thought.

Addison, Quena.

merry-tottery (mer'i-tot'er), n. [ME. merry-totyr, merytotyr, mery totyr, myry totyr; mer-ry + totter, a swing.] A swing for children.
Parr., p. 518; Cath. Ang., pp. 235, 300.

merry-trotter (mer'i-trot'er), n. A variant of merry-totter.
Halliwell, [Prov. Eng.]

merrywing (mer'i-wing), n. The whistling or common goldeneye of Europe and America, Clangula clangula; also, the buffle, Bucphala albeola. G. Trumbull, 1868. See cut under buffle. [Connecticut.]

merse (mérs), v. t. [L. mersare, dip, frog, of mergere, pp. mersus, dip: see merge.] To dip or plunge into or under a liquid.

In all cases where the simple envelopment of the object, only, is concerned, no word, probably, is more unexceptionable than merse. (1) This word is of common use in cases where an object is placed in a fluid, semi-fluid, or any easily penetrable material. (2) It depends upon no form of act. (3) It is without limit of duration.
J. W. Dale, Classic Baptism, p. 131.

mersement, n. See mercement. Gesta Romanorum, p. 288. (Halliwell.)

Mersenne's laws. See law.

mersht, n. An obsolete form of marsh.

merston (mer'shun), n. [= F. merston, L. mersio(n)], a dipping. C. merge, pp. mersus, dip: see merge, merge. Cf. emersion, immersion, submersion.] The act of dipping or plunging under a liquid; immersion.

The merston also in water, and the merston thence, doth assure our death to the former, and reviving to a new life.
Barrow, Baptism.

merswinet, n. See mereswine.

Mertensia (mer'ten-si-á), n. [NL. (Roth, 1797), named after F. C. Mertens, a German botanist.] A genus of boraginaceous plants of the tribe Boraginæ and the subtribe Lithospermæ, characterized by having bractless or very slightly bracted flower-clusters, an almost naked corolla of bell-funnel shape, and obliquely attached nutlets. There are about 15 species, natives of eastern Europe, extratropical Asia, and North America. They are perennial herbs, with alternate entire leaves and handsome blue or purplish flowers in corymbs composed of loose raceme-like clusters. The plants are called smooth lungwort. M. Virginica, the Virginian cowslip or lungwort, is a fine spring wild flower of the eastern United States, also in gardens. M. maritima, the sea-lungwort, with smaller flowers, is a sea-coast plant of both hemispheres in northern latitudes, also called sea bugloss, and locally oyster-plant. See lungwort, 2.

merthet, n. An obsolete form of mirth.

Mera (mer'á), n. In Hind. myth., the central mountain of the earth, of prodigious size and precious material, having on its summit the abode of the gods.

Merula (mer'ú-lá), n. [NL. < L. merula, a blackbird: see merle.] A genus of thrushes, of the family Turdidae, giving to that family the alternative name Merulidae. The genus, in the sense in which it is at present used, was based in 1816 by W. E. Leach upon the European blackbird, Turdus merula, or Merula vulgaris. (See cut under blackbird.) It also includes such species as the ring-ouzel, M. turkesta, and the American robin, M. migratoria. By many naturalists it is used as a subgenus or more synonym of Turdus. Cupressus in one sense is a synonym.

Merulidæ (me-rú-li-dé), n. pl. [NL. < Merula + -idæ.] A family of dextriostrous oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Merula, now usually called Turdidae; the thrushes. In the classification of Audinon (1837) it was differently constituted from Turdidae proper, and divided into Brachypodina, Myiophagina, Merulina, Crateropodina, and Oridina.

Merulina (mer'ú-lín), a. Of or pertaining to the genus Merula, or a subfamily Merulina.

Mersa, n. See merse.

mervaillet, a. A Middle English variant of marvelous.

Mervaillet, mervaillet, etc., n. and c. Obsolete forms of marvel.

mervell-du-jour (mer-vá'y-dú-zhór'), n. [F. mervelle-du-jour, lit. 'marvel of the day'; merveille, marvel; du for de le, gen. of def. art., of the; jour, day.] An English collectors' name for certain noctuid moths. The common mervell-du-jour is Agriopsis aprilina; another is Diphthera orion.

merveliet, merveliet, etc., n. and c. Obsolete forms of marvel.

mervellense (mer-vá-lyèz'), n. [F. fem. of mervelleux, marvelous: see marvelous.] A fashionable woman under the Directory in France at the close of the eighteenth century, at which time ultra-fashionable people affected extraordinary innovations in costume, especially in a fancied revival of the feminine dress of the ancient Greeks and Romans, and even of their mythology. See incroyable.

mervelet, mervellet, n. and c. Obsolete forms of marvel.

merveloust, merveloust, a. Middle English forms of marvelous.

merwoman (mer'wúm'an), n. pl. merwomen (-wím'en). [C. mer-, as in mermaid, + woman.] A fabled sea-creature with the body of a woman and the tail of a fish; a mermaid. T. Gill.

meryt, a. An obsolete form of merry.

Merychippus (mer-i-kip'us), n. [NL. < Gr. μῆρυξ (mēryx), a ruminating animal (applied to a fish) (> μῆρυξ, μῆρυξ, ruminant: see merycam), + ἵππος, horse.] A genus of fossil horses, of the family Equidae, founded by Leidy in 1850 upon remains from the Pliocene of North America. It is one of the more recent extinct forms, related to Hipparion and to Protolipus.

meryclism (mer'i-sizm), n. [C. Gr. μῆρυξ, chewing the cud, rumination, < μῆρυξ, chew the cud, ruminate.] The abnormal habit or act of raising the food from the stomach to the mouth, and remasticating it; rumination in the human species. It occurs in healthy persons, but is more frequent in association with mental defect or disease.

Merycopotamidae (mer'i-kō-pō-tám'i-dé), n. pl. [NL. < Merycopotamus + -idæ.] An extinct family of omnivorous artiodactyl ungulates, typified by the genus Merycopotamus. The nearest relatives of these animals are the existing hippopotamuses, with which they agree in the massive body with phalangiate feet of four digits each, the obtuse rounded snout with superlateral nostrils and the two lingual mammae. They differ in some dental characters, as the comparatively small cylindrical canines, and the inequality of the upper and lower molars, the former of which simulate those of ruminants in the detail of their structure.

Merycopotamoides (mer'i-kō-pō-tám'oi-dé), n. pl. [NL. < Merycopotamus + -oides.] A superfamily founded by Gill in 1872 for the reception of the family Merycopotamidae.

Merycopotamus (mer-i-kō-pōt'á-nus), n. [NL. < Gr. μῆρυξ (mēryx), a ruminating animal (> μῆρυξ, μῆρυξ, ruminant), + ποταμός, river. Cf. hippopotamus.] The typical and only genus of the family Merycopotamidae, founded by Falconer and Cautley upon remains from the Siwalik hills of India.

mes, n. An obsolete form of mes.

mes-, n. An obsolete form of the prefix mes-.

mesa (mé-sá), n. [Sp. < L. mensa, a table: see mensal.] A table-land; a broad and flat river-terrace; a level or gently sloping region. This Spanish word is in common use throughout the southwestern part of the United States, where large areas, especially on the Colorado river and its branches, are table lands, deeply intersected by valleys (canyons) of erosion, which are often 1,000 or 2,000 feet deep, and occasionally much more.

mesad (mé-sád), adv. [C. meson + -ad.] Toward the meson; in a mesal direction. B. G. Wilder.

mesal, mezal, n. [OF. ?] The vizor of a helmet, especially of the armet, or any headpiece having the face-opening covered by two separate movable parts, the upper one of which contained the visors, or sight-opening. See cut in next column.

mesal (mes'al), a. [C. meson + -al.] Middle; median; relating to the meson or middle lengthwise vertical plane of the body between the right side and the left. Also median and medial.

mesalliance (mé-sál-li-áns'), n. [F.] Same as mesalliance.

mesally (mes'al-i), adv. In the meson or median plane of the body: as, to cut mesally, to be situated mesally. Also mesially.

Helmet with Mesal in two parts. Spanish, 16th century.

mesemboid (mes-a-nó-boid), n. [C. Gr. μέσος, middle, + Νῆλ, amara, q. v., + (Gr. εἶδος, form).] One of the free amebiform cells of the mesoderm or middle germ-layer of the embryo; also, a leucocyte or wandering cell of the adult.

mesaraió (mes-a-rá'ík), a. and n. [C. Gr. μεσάραιος, pertaining to the mesentery, < μεσάραιον (see, άρρα), the mesentery, < μέσος, middle (see meson), + άραιό, the flank, belly, < άραιός, thin, lean. Cf. mesentery.] I. a. In anat., of or pertaining to the mesentery; mesenteric: chiefly in the compound amphlomesaraió.
II. n. Same as mesentery.

mesaraiócal (mes-a-rá'í-kál), a. [C. mesaraió + -al.] Same as mesaraió. Also, erroneously, mesaraiócal.

Vena porta is a vein coming from the concave of the liver, and receiving those mesaraiócal veins by whom he takes the chylus from the stomach and guta, and conveys it to the liver.
Burton, Anat. of Med., p. 81.

mesarteritis (mes-ár-té-rít'is), n. [C. Gr. μέσος, middle, + αρτήρ, an artery, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle coat of an artery.

mesaticcephali (mes'a-ti-sé-f'á-lí), n. pl. [NL. see mesatcephalic.] Persons whose skulls are mesatcephalic.

mesaticcephalic (mes'a-ti-sé-f'á-lík or -sé-f'á-lík), a. [C. Gr. μεσάτιος, Attic μέσος, middle (poet. superl. of μέσος, middle), + κεφαλή, head: see cephalic.] Having an index of breadth from 75 to 80 (Topinard): applied to skulls.

Skulls are classified according to their cephalic indices into three groups: dolichocephalic, mesocephalic, and brachycephalic.
Nature, XXXIII. 6.

mesaventuret, messaventuret, n. Middle English forms of mesaventure.

mescal (mes-kál), n. [C. Sp. mescal, < Mex. mescalli.] A strong intoxicating spirit distilled from pulque, the fermented juice of the Agave Americana of Mexico. Also mezcal, mescal.

meschaunce, n. A Middle English form of meschaunce.

meschieft, meschefet, meschevet, n. and v. Middle English forms of meschieft.

meschitt, n. A form of mesquit.

mesdames, n. Plural of madame.

mesdemoiselles, n. Plural of mademoiselle.

mesel, n. [ME. also mesel, mes, < AH. mēsa, mēsa, mēsa, mēsa, a table, also what is on the table, = [111] mēsa, mēsa = Goth. mēsa, a table; cf. L. mensa, a table: see mensal.] A dinner; meal.

My lordes ea servede at ylk a mesel.

With thirly knyghtis laire and free.

Thomas of Erasmounde (Child's Ballads, I. 108).

mesel, v. t. [ME. mesen, moderate, subdue; prob. of Scand. origin, orig. refl. form, corresponding to mekel, v.: see mekel.] To moderate; subdue; abate; mollify.

Wyth thom mesel thy mode (abate thy anger) and mendinge thyde.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), II. 764.

Mese your hart and mend your mode.

Thomas of Erasmounde, p. 175.

mesel (mé-sé), n. A dialectal form of mesel.
mesecens (mé-sé-sén'), v. imper.; pret. mesecemed. [Orig. and prop. two words me seems (pret. me seemed); me, dat. of I (see me); seem, appear: see seem. Cf. methinks.] It seems to me. See methinks.

And when in Combat these fell Monsters croue,

Me seeme wome Tempted all the seas doth toun.

Sylvestre, tr. of The Barons' Wars, I. 5.

The knave that doth thee service as full knight

Is all as good, me seems, as any knight.

Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

meselset, n. A Middle English form of mesel.

Small meshed net about 18 inches deep. Favos, II. 498
 Meshed work, embroidery on netting, the original form of needle-point lace: common in the seventeenth century.

meshing-net (mesh'ing-net), n. A net in the meshes of which fish are caught by their gills; a gill-net.

mesh-stick (mesh'stik), n. In making nets, a flat stick with rounded ends and angles, about which the thread or twine is netted or looped, and which gauges the size of the meshes so that they are of uniform dimensions.

mesh-structure (mesh'struk'tūr), n. In lithol., a sort of network frequently seen in alteration products of minerals, and especially in the commonly occurring change of olivin to serpentine. Also called net-structure and lattice-structure—the latter when the linear arrangement of the products is such as gives rise to luscage-shaped figures, as in the case of the alteration of hornblende.

meshwork (mesh'werk), n. A network; meshes collectively; a web; a plexus; cancellation.

If this Danton were to burst your mesh-work!—Very curious indeed to consider.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. vii. 2.

meshy (mesh'i), a. [mesh + -y.] 1. Formed like network; reticulated.—2. Resembling network; divided into small equal parts.

When all the treasures of the deep Into their meshy cells were poured. J. Basilie.

mesial (mes'i-al or me'zi-al), a. [NL. mesialis (formed according to medialis, medial), < Gr. mesos, middle, mid; see meson.] Pertaining to the middle; being in the middle; in zool., pertaining to or on the middle line or plane of the body; median. Also median.—Mesial aspect, the aspect of an organ which is toward the mesial plane or meson, as distinguished from its distal or distal aspect.—Mesial line. Same as median line (which see, under median).—Mesial plane, the meson or meson.

mesially (mes'i- or me'zi-al-i), adv. Same as mesally.

mesialward (mes'i-al-wārd), adv. [mesial + -ward.] Same as mesad.

mesian (mes'i-an), a. [mesian (from mesian) + -an.] Same as mesial or mesal. Barclay.

mesion (mes'i-on), n. [NL. (John Barclay, 1803), < Gr. mesos, middle; see mesal.] The middle or median longitudinal plane of the body of a bilaterally symmetrical animal, dividing it into equal and similar right and left halves; the meson.

mesism (mes'i-sim), n. An abbreviation of mesismism.

Mesites (me-sit'ez), n. [NL., < Gr. mesites, a mediator, < mesos, middle; see mesal.] 1. A genus of birds peculiar to Madagascar, type of the family Mesitidae, presenting a very unusual combination of characters. The general appearance is thrush-like, and there are points about the bird which have caused it to be classed with thrushes, pigeons, galinaceous birds, rails, herons, etc. The nearest relatives of Mesites are the sun-bittern (Eurypyga) and the kagu (Bucconotus). (See cuts under Eurypyga and kagu.) M. carinata is cinnamon-brown varied with black. The genus was founded by Isidore Geoffroy St. Hilaire in 1836. It is also called Mesitornis and Mesornis.

Mesite variegata

2. In entom., a genus of beetles of the family Calandridae, of wide distribution and few species. They abound in Madeira and the Canary Islands, breeding in decaying and dead euphorbia and laurels. Two species occur in the United States, M. virgulinervis and M. ruficollis.

3. A genus of fishes; same as Galaxias. Jenyns, 1842.—4. A genus of echinoderms.

Mesitidae (me-sit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesites + -idae.] A family of gallinaceous birds, represented by Mesites, and related to the Eurypyga and Rhinocetidae, but not to the Eupetidae. Also Mesitinae, as a subfamily of Eupetidae.

mesitine spar (mes'i-tin-spār), n. [mesitine (< Gr. mesites, a mediator, lit. being in the middle, + -itine) + spar.] A carbonate of magnesium and iron intermediate between magnesite and siderite, occurring in yellowish rhombohedral crystals at Traversella in Piedmont.

mesurus (mes'i-ris), n. [Gr. mesuros, a mediator (lit. being in the middle) (see Mesites), + -urus.] Same as mesitine spar.

mesutile (mes'i-til), n. Same as mesitine.

mesityl (mes'i-til), n. [As mesitide + -yl.] An organic radical, C_6H_5 , whose oxid yields acetone by hydration.

mesitylene (mes'i-ti-len), n. [mesityl + -ene.] Trimethyl benzol, an oily, colorless liquid, $C_6H_3(CH_3)_3$, obtained from acetone distilled with half its volume of fuming sulphuric acid. It is a constituent of coal-tar.

mesium (mes'i-um), n.; pl. mesia (-i). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle; see meson.] Same as meson, 1. Barclay.

mesjid, n. Same as masjid.

meskito, n. See mesquite.

meskin, n. Same as maskin.

meskit, n. Same as mesquite.

meskit, n. See mesquite.

meslé (me-lā'), a. [OF., pp. of mesler, mix; see meddle, well.] In her., divided into small parts, paly, bendy, barruly, etc., and alternately a color and a metal.

meslin, n. and a. Same as maslin.

meslin, n. See maslin.

mesmerize (mez-mēr-ēz'), v. t. [mesmer (see mesmer) + -ize.] The person on whom a mesmerist operates; one who is mesmerized. Imp. Dict.

mesmeric (mez-mēr'ik), a. [Mesmer (see mesmer) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesmerism; produced by mesmerism, or resembling its effects: as, the mesmeric theory; mesmeric sleep.

Phenomena . . . induced by mesmeric or hypnotic methods. Brad., France, p. 3.

Mesmeric lucidity, clairvoyance

We are especially anxious to witness cases of what is termed mesmeric lucidity or clairvoyance.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, April, 1883, p. vi.

Mesmeric promise. See the quotation

Some of the cases adduced . . . as of the so-called mesmeric promise, or impression made on the brain in the mesmeric state, which irresistibly works itself out in the subsequent normal condition . . . present a singular conformity to some of the best physiological speculations on the mechanism of memory. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, 1883, p. 208.

mesmerical (mez-mēr'ik-al), a. [mesmer + -al.] Same as mesmeric.

mesmerically (mez-mēr'ik-al-i), adv. In a mesmeric way; in the manner of or according to Mesmer or mesmerism; by mesmeric means.

mesmerisation, mesmerise, etc. See mesmerization, etc.

mesmerism (mez-mēr-izm), n. [F. mesmerisme (Sp. Fig. It. mesmerismo); so called from Friedrich Anton (or Franz) Mesmer (1733-1815), a German physician, who propounded the theory in 1774, in Paris.] 1. The doctrine that one person can exercise influence over the will and nervous system of another, and produce certain phenomena by virtue of a supposed emanation, called animal magnetism, proceeding from him, or simply by the domination of his will over that of the person operated on. Originally Mesmer professed to produce his results by the operation of actual magnets, but all such apparatus has long been abandoned, and those who profess belief in magnetism as the cause of the phenomena exhibited refer it to the body of the mesmerist. The actual phenomena believed to be produced by this so-called animal magnetism are now explained by modern hypnotism, or artificial somnambulism, which within recent years has been the subject of extended research. It is now generally admitted that there is no force of any kind transmitted from the operator to the person operated upon, and many of the pretensions of mesmerism, such as clairvoyance, are rejected. The term mesmerism is still popularly used, often more or less synonymously with hypnotism, but more frequently in its original or an allied sense. Other terms used more or less synonymously with either mesmerism or hypnotism are trance (after the English surgeon Brad), who first studied the phenomena of mesmerism scientifically, and neurohypnotology.

By one of my usual processes for reducing the cataleptic state of muscles during hypnosis or mesmerism, I was enabled, in a few seconds, to unlock her jaws and open her mouth. Brad., France, p. 50.

2. The influence itself; animal magnetism.

mesmerist (mez-mēr-ist), n. [mesmerize + -ist.] One who practises mesmerism.

The extravagance of the mesmerists, who have contended for the reality of clairvoyance in some of their patients. Brad., France, p. 36.

mesmerization (mez-mēr-i-zā'shun), n. [mesmerize + -ation.] The act of mesmerizing, or the state of being mesmerized. Also spelled mesmerisation.

mesmerize (mez-mēr-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mesmerized, ppr. mesmerizing. [mesmer (see mesmer) + -ize.] To practise mesmerism upon; bring into a mesmeric state; hypnotize. Also spelled mesmerise.

The rigidity of the mesmerized fingers could be tested with, if possible, even more certainty than their insensibility, by simply telling the "subject" after a minute of mesmerization, to close his or her fist.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 100.

mesmerizer (mez-mēr-i-zer), n. One who mesmerizes; a mesmerist. Also spelled mesmeriser.

mesmeromania (mez-mēr-ō-mā'ni-ā), n. [mesmer (see mesmer) + mania.] Mesmerism regarded as a mania or delusion.

"The mesmeromania," says one doctor in the Medical-Chirurgical Review, "has nearly dwindled in the metropolis into an idle fatuity."

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 412, note.

mesmeromaniac (mez-mēr-ō-mā'ni-ak), n. [mesmeromania + -ac, after maniac.] A person affected with mesmeromania.

mesnality (me-nal'i-ti), n. Same as mesnality.

mesnalty (me-nal'ti), n. [mesne + -al + -ty. (< mesnality.)] The manor or estate of a mesne lord.

And the consequence of construing it otherwise would be dangerous to create a mesnality. But this mesnality doth not extinct the Lord's tenure, but he may still charge the lands for it, albeit not the person of the tenant. Wach and Wale, 2 Kolia, 566.

mesne (mēn), a. [An archaic spelling of mesne (ME. mesne, < OF. mesne, etc.), retained in law use.] In law, middle; intervening; intermediate. A mesne lord was a feudal lord who held land of a superior, but had granted a part of it to another person. Thus, he was a tenant to the superior, but lord or superior to the second grantee, and thus his mesne or mediate lord.

They rank from the rank of tenants in-chief to the rank of mesne tenants.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, IV. 28.

Mesne conveyance. See conveyance.—Mesne encumbrances, encumbrances the right of priority of which is intermediate to the dates of two other encumbrances or titles under consideration. Mesne process, any process in a suit which intervenes between the original process of writ and the final execution. Mesne profits, the profits of an estate which accrue to a tenant in possession intermediate between two dates, particularly the commencement and the termination of a possession held without right.

mesoarial (mes-ō-ā'ri-āl), a. [mesarium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesarium. Encyc. Brit., XII. 680.

mesoarium (mes-ō-ā'ri-um), n.; pl. mesoaria (-i). [NL., < Gr. mesos + sauros, dim. of sauros, egg. (< Gr. mesos, middle, + -sauros, a lizard, a serpent; see sauros.)] A fold of the peritoneum forming the mesentery of the ovary or genital gland of some animals, as fishes; a mesovarium.

The genital glands . . . overlie the kidneys, . . . each being suspended by a fold of mesentery (mesarium). Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 58.

mesoblast (mek-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. mesos, middle, + blastos, a germ.] The middle one of the three germinal layers of any metazoan embryo, between the epiblast and the hypoblast; the mesoderm. It corresponds to the mesoderm layer of an earlier nomenclature, when the other two layers were called ectoderm and endoderm. By far the greater part of the body of a metazoan animal is derived from the mesoblast.

mesoblastema (mek-ō-blāst-ē-mā), n.; pl. mesoblastemata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + blastema, a shoot, a sprout; see blastema.] The mass or layer of cells which constitutes the mesoblast; the mesoderm in its early germination.

mesoblastemic (mek-ō-blāst-ēm'ik), a. [mesoblastema + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesoblastema; as, mesoblastemic cells or tissue.

mesoblastic (mek-ō-blāst'ik), a. [mesoblast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesoblast; as, a mesoblastic cell; the mesoblastic layer.

mesobranchial (mek-ō-brāng'ki-āl), a. [Gr. mesos, middle, + branchia, gills; see branchial.] Overlying the middle of the branchial chambers; applied specifically to a median subdivision of the branchial region of the carapace of a crab, called the mesobranchial lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

mesocacal (mek-ō-kā'kal), a. [mesocacum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesocacum.

mesocacum (mek-ō-kā'kum), n.; pl. mesocaca (-kā). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. cacum, q. v.] The mesentery of the caecum and vermiform appendage; the special peritoneal fold which sometimes holds those parts in place.

mesocarp (mek-ō-kārp), n. [= F. mesocarp; < NL. mesocarpium, < Gr. mesos, middle, + carpe, fruit.] In bot., the middle layer of a pericarp when it is possible to distinguish three dissimilar layers: the sarcocarp. It is the fleshy substance or edible part of fruits which lies between the epicarp and the endocarp. See cut under drupe and endocarp.

Mesocarpacae (mek-ō-kā-r-pā'kē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesocarpus + -aceae.] One of the three families of algae into which the group Conjugatae is divided. The sexual reproduction is by a process of conjugation, which may be either scalariform (that is, between two or several cells of two different filaments) or lateral (that is, between two adjacent cells of the same filament). The result of this conjugation is the production of a globular zygospore, which differs from that produced by the Zygnemataceae in that immediately after its formation it divides into two, three or more cells, the central one only of which is fertile. Sometimes Mesocarpacem. See Conjugatae.

Mesocarpus (mes-o-kar'pus), n. [NL. (Hassall, 1843), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of fresh water algae, typical of the family Mesocarpacem. The copulation is scalariform, and the spores are spherical or oval, between two cylindrical, straight, or slightly lobed cells.

mesocephalic (mes-o-sef'álik or -séf'álik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head, + -αίος.] 1. In cranium, of medium size; neither large nor small; with a capacity of from 1.350 to 1.450 cubic centimeters.

A skull of variable form, mostly mesocephalic.

W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII, 317.

2. Having a skull of medium breadth or capacity.

mesocephalism (mes-o-séf'á-lizm), n. [< mesocephalic + -ism.] The character or state of being mesocephalic. Also mesocephaly.

Departures from a width of eight and length of ten (mesocephalism), measured from one auricular aperture over the head to the other, and none root over the head to the nucha, determine whether the skull shall be considered long. Amer. Nat., XXII, 614.

mesocephalon (mes-o-séf'á-lon), n.; pl. mesocephala (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head.] Same as mesocephalum.

mesocephalous (mes-o-séf'á-lus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head, + -ους.] Mesocephalic.

mesocephaly (mes-o-séf'á-li), n. Same as mesocephalism.

mesochil (mes-o-kil), n. [< NL. mesochilium, q. v.] Same as mesochilium.

mesochillium (mes-o-kil'li-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + χίλος, lip.] The intermediate part of the lip of such orchids as have this organ separated into three distinct parts. Lindley, Treasury of Botany.

mesochorus (mes-o-kor'us), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + χóρος, chorus.] Same as coryphæus, 1.

mesocole (mes-o-kol), n. Same as mesocolia.

mesocolia (mes-o-kol'li-ā), n.; pl. mesocolia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κόλη, a hollow, ventricle; see colia.] The ventricle of the mesencephalon; the mesencephalic cavity of the brain, connecting the diacolla with the epimelia; the aqueduct of Sylvius. B. G. Wilder.

mesocolian (mes-o-kol'li-an), a. [< mesocolia + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the mesocolia of the brain.

Mesocolia tubular; mesocolian roof quadrilobate.

Amer. Nat., XXI, 914.

mesocolic (mes-o-kol'ik), a. [< mesocolia + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesocolia; as, a mesocolic peritoneal fold; mesocolic attachment.

mesocolon (mes-o-kol'lon), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κόλον, colon, the part of the mesentery next the colon; < μέσος, middle, + κόλον, the colon; see colon.] The mesentery of the colon; the peritoneal fold which holds the colon in place.

mesocoracoid (mes-o-kor'á-koid), a. and n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + Ε. coracoid.] 1. a. Situated between the hypercoracoid and the hypocoracoid.

2. n. An element in the shoulder-girdle of teleost fishes, disintegrated from the coracoid or paragonal cartilage, and intermediate between or bridging over the hypercoracoid and hypocoracoid. It is developed in the malacopterygian and plecostomydous fishes, but is lost in the acanthopterygians.

mesocuneiform (mes-o-kū'ne-i-fōrm), n. and a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + Ε. cuneiform.] 1. n. In anat. and zool., the middle one of the three cuneiform bones of the tarsus, lying between the ectocuneiform and the entocuneiform. It is in special relation with the head of the second metatarsal bone. Also called mesosphenoide.

2. a. Middle, as a cuneiform bone; pertaining to the mesocuneiform.

mesode (mes-od), n. [< Gr. μέσος, a mesode (see def.), < μέσος, middle, + αἶμαρ, day, sing., < αἶμαρ, a song, ode; see ode.] In anc. pros., a system of metrically different composition intervening between a strophe and its antistrophe. See epode.

mesoderm (mes-ō-dērm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, skin.] 1. The middle germinal layer of the three-layered embryo of any metazoan animal, lying between the endoderm and the ectoderm. The term is used synonymously with mesoblast, the correlation being endoderm, mesoderm, and ectoderm; hypoblast, mesoblast, and epiblast, or mucous, vascular, and serous layers. Most of the body of every metazoan animal is derived from the mesoderm. When the embryo becomes four-layered, as it usually does, this state results from the splitting of the mesoderm into an inner visceral and an outer parietal layer, called respectively epi-mesoderm and meso-mesoderm, or visceral and splanchnopleural and somatopleural, or visceral and splanchnopleural.

2. In bot., the middle layer of tissue in the shell of the spore-case of an urn-moss.

mesodermal (mes-ō-dēr-mal), a. [< mesoderm + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoderm in plants or animals; having a middle germinal layer.

Mesodermalia (mes-ō-dēr-mā'li-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, skin.] Spongiopora or Porifera regarded as a prime division of the grade Ctenophora, whose archenteron is a branching canal-system communicating with the outer water by a set of incurrent and excurrent pores; the sponges; opposed to Epithelaria, or all other ctenophores collectively. R. von Lendenfeld.

mesodermalian (mes-ō-dēr-mā'li-an), a. and n. [< Mesodermalia + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to the Mesodermalia, or having their characters.

2. n. A member of the Mesodermalia.

mesodermic (mes-ō-dēr-mik), a. [< mesoderm + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a mesoderm or middle germinal layer; mesodermal.

And so form the foundation of the mesodermic investment by which the body cavity of the adult is lined.

A. Sedgwick, Micros. Science, XXVII, 409.

Mesodesma (mes-ō-des'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, a band; see desma.] A genus of wedge-shells of the family Dontidae, or made-type of a family Mesodesmidae, having a thick solid trigonal shell with two short stout lateral teeth, and the cartilage internal. Species abundant in the Australian region.

Mesodesmidae (mes-ō-des'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesodesma + -idae.] A family of bivalve mollusks, named from the genus Mesodesma. J. E. Gray, 1840.

mesodic (mes-ō-dik), a. [< mesode + -ic.]

In anc. pros., constituting or pertaining to a colon, line, or system of a different length or metrical character interposed between two cola, two sets of uniform lines, or two systems of identical metrical form; especially, constituting, pertaining to, or containing a system of different form intervening between a strophe and its antistrophe. See epodic, palinodic, perimbo, proimbo.

mesodont (mes-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + δόντις (dōnti-) = E. tooth.] 1. In anthrop., having medium-sized teeth; as, the mesodont races.

2. In zool., pertaining to the Mesodontia, or having their characters.

Mesodontia (mes-ō-dont'ia), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δόντις (dōnti-) = E. tooth.] A group of extinct mammals of North America, resembling Insectivora, characterized by Cope as a suborder of Bastatheria, having the incisors not growing from persistent pulps, the molars tubercular and never sectorial, the third character apparently elevated, and the astragalus not grooved above. Ten Eocene genera are referred to this group.

mesoduodenal (mes-ō-dū-ō-dē-nal), a. [< mesoduodenum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoduodenum.

mesoduodenum (mes-ō-dū-ō-dē-num), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ΝL. duodenum, q. v.] The fold of peritoneum which incloses and supports the duodenum; the duodenal mesentery.

mesogaster (mes-ō-gas'ter), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γαστήρ, belly.] 1. An intermediate part of the intestine, extending from the pylorus to the caecum, and including the small intestine with its annexes; as the liver and pancreas, also, in the fetus, the umbilical vesicle. It is commonly called the mid-gut.

2. [cap.] A genus of fossil fishes. Agassiz.

mesogastral (mes-ō-gas'tral), a. [< mesogaster + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesogaster.

mesogastric (mes-ō-gas'trik), a. [< mesogastrium + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the mesogastrium; umbilical, as a region of the abdomen; mesenteric with reference to the stomach or to the mesogaster.

2. In Crustacea, situated in the middle of the gastric lobe of the carapace; specifically applied to a median subdivision of that lobe, the mesogastric lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

mesogastrium (mes-ō-gas'tri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γαστήρ, belly.] 1. In human anat., the umbilical region of the abdomen, between the epigastrium above and the hypogastrium or epipubic region below. See cut under abdomen.

2. In anat. and zool., the mesenteric of the stomach; the fold of peritoneum which holds the stomach in place. It is a portion of the common intestinal mesentery, in early fetal life indistinguishable therefrom, but afterward variously modified.

mesogenous (mes-ō-j'e-nus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + -γενος, born, produced; see genous.] Increasing by growth at or from the middle, as the spores of certain fungi. [Rare.]

mesoglossa (mes-ō-glos'sā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γλῶσσα, glōssa; see glossa.] 1. The mesodermal intercellular substance, or ground-substance, of some animals, as sponges and other ctenophores. R. von Lendenfeld, Proc. Zool. Soc., London, 1886, p. 566.

2. [cap.] A genus of gelatinous seaweeds, typical of the Mesoglossaceae, with olive-brown branching filiform fronds. The unilocular sporangia are oval in shape and borne at the base of peripheral filaments; the plurilocular sporangia are unknown. Agardh, 1817.

Mesoglossaceae (mes-ō-glos'sā-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Kuetzing, 1843), < Mesoglossa + -aceae.] A family of olive-green seaweeds with a gelatinous or cartilaginous thallus of hemispherical or cylindrical outline, forming small gelatinous or slimy cushions or branching tufts on other larger seaweeds; the same or nearly the same as the Chordarieae or Chordarieaceae of Harvey. See Chordarieae.

mesoglossal (mes-ō-glos'sal), a. [< mesoglossa + -al.] Consisting of, pertaining to, or resembling mesoglossa.

mesoglossus (mes-ō-glos'sus), n.; pl. mesoglossi (-i). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ΝL. glossus, q. v.] The middle gluteal muscle; the gluteus medius.

mesogluteal (mes-ō-glos'sal), a. [< mesoglossus + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoglossus.

mesognathic (mes-ō-gnath'ik), a. Same as mesognathous.

mesognathous (mes-ō-gnath'us), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + γνάθος, jaw.] 1. Having a moderate or intermediate gnathic index of from 98 to 103, as a skull.

2. Having a skull thus characterized, as a person.

mesognathy (mes-ō-gnath'us), n. [< mesognathous + -y.] That character of a skull or person in which the jaws are moderately prominent anteriorly, indicated by a gnathic index of from 98 to 103.

Mesohippus (mes-ō-hip'us), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἵππος, a horse.] A genus of very small three-toed horses, of the family Equidae, founded by Marsh in 1875 upon remains from the early Miocene of North America. The animal was only about as large as a sheep, with three functional digits on each foot, and an additional splint-bone on each of the fore feet.

mesolabe (mes-ō-lāb), n. [< L. mesolabium, < Gr. μεσολαβία, prop. μεσολαβία, an instrument invented by Eratosthenes for finding mean proportional lines. < μέσος, middle, mean (neut. pl. μέσα, mean terms), + λαβάνειν, λάνειν, take. (cf. astrolabe.) A mechanical contrivance for geometrically extracting the roots of quantities. It consists of a number of equal rectangles, each having a diagonal marked, and all capable of sliding along a line common to the bases of all, so that they partially overlap one another. The marked diagonals are all parallel. To use the instrument, all the intersections, each formed of the diagonal of one rectangle and the overlapping edge of the next one, are brought, by the sliding along of the rectangles, into one straight line with one extremity of the diagonal of the uppermost rectangle and a point on the exposed edge of the lowermost whose distance from the extremity of the diagonal on the same edge measures the quantity whose root is to be extracted. Then the corresponding distance on the uppermost rectangle is the most multiplied by that of the common altitude of the rectangle which last is supposed to be known. The exponent of the root is equal to the number of rectangles employed. The mesolobe was invented by Brachisthenes, about 300 to 350 years before Christ.

Mesodesma glabratum—right valve

mesole (mes'ōl), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle (l).] See thomsonite.

mesolite (mes'ō-lit), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + λίθος, stone.] A zeolitic mineral resembling scapolite, but containing both calcium and sodium.

mesolobar (mes'ō-lō-bār), n. [Gr. mesolobe + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the mesolobe; callosal: as, mesolobar arteries. [Rare.]

mesolobe (mes'ō-lōb), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + λόβος, lobe: see lobe.] The callosum or corpus callosum of the brain; the great commissure of the cerebral hemispheres. [Rare or obsolete.]

mesologarithm (mes'ō-log'ā-rithm), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. logarithm.] A logarithm of the cosine or cotangent. Kepler.

mesological (mes'ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [mesology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesology; relating to the medium in which an organism exists.

Grapes contain the mineral salts in variable quantity, the proportion depending on the variety of grape and on mesological conditions.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III, 882.

mesology (me-sol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + -λογία, lógos, speak: see -ology.] The sum of human knowledge concerning the relations of an organism to its environment.

mesomeristem (mes'ō-mer'is-tem), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. meristem.] The innermost of the two layers into which the exomeristem is divided. The exomeristem is the thickening-ring which surrounds the axial strand (primary pith of Sauter) or pith-cylinder of the nascent shoots or branches of plants. It is divided into two layers, the mesomeristem, which gives rise to the vascular bundles, and the perimeristem, which gives rise to the external cortex and the dermalogen.

mesometric (mes'ō-met'rik), a. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. metric.] Of or pertaining to a mesometry or mesometrium: as, mesometric folds of peritoneum.

mesometritis (mes'ō-met'ri-tis), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + μήτρα, the womb, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle or muscular coat of the uterus. Compare metritis.

mesometrium (mes'ō-met'ri-um), n.; pl. mesometria (-iā). Same as mesometry.

mesometry (mes'ō-met'ri), n.; pl. mesometrias (-triz). [NL., mesometrium, Gr. μέσος, middle, intermediate, + μήτρα, the womb: see matrix.] The mesentery of the womb or its annexes; a peritoneal fold, holding in place the uterus or an oviduct. The broad ligament of the human uterus is a mesometry. Corresponding duplications of Y stomum acquire special characters in different cases.

It [the oviduct of a bird] is supported by peritoneal folds forming a mesometry, like the mesentery of the intestines. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 221.

Mesomphalia (mes-om-fā'li-ā), n. [NL. (Hope, 1838), Gr. μέσος, middle, + μυαλός, the navel.] A genus of beetles of the family Chrysomelidae. They are almost exclusively South American, there being over 300 such species, as against one in North America. M. conspersus is a South American species with pinkish elytra of a blackish-green color punctured with velvety black spots, and burnished with six larger golden-haired spots.

Mesomyodi (mes'ō-mī-ō'dī), n. pl. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + μύς, muscle, + ὄδιον, song.] A suborder or other prime division of Passeres, in which the syrinx is mesomyodian; non-melodious or songless passerine birds: distinguished from Aceromyodi.

mesomyodian (mes'ō-mī-ō'di-ān), a. [As Mesomyodi + -ian.] Having the intrinsic syringeal muscles attached to the middle part of the upper bronchial rings.

Syrinx with less than four distinct pairs of intrinsic muscles inserted at the middle of the upper bronchial half-ring, representing the mesomyodian type of voice organ. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 427.

mesomyodous (mes'ō-mī-ō'dus), a. [As Mesomyodi + -ous.] Same as mesomyodian.

meson (mes'ōn), a. [Gr. μέσος, the middle, neut. of μέσος = L. medius, middle: see medium, medial.] 1. The median plane which divides a body into two equal and symmetrical parts; the vertical longitudinal middle plane, dividing the body into right and left halves. Every median line lies in the meson. The dorsal border of the meson is called the dorsomeson; the ventral, ventrimeson. Also meson. See median, a.

The meson, mesal, or median plane is an imaginary longitudinal plane extending from the dorsal surface of the body to the ventral surface, and dividing the body into right and left symmetrical halves.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 108.

2. See tracheal.

mesondu, mesondian, n. See mesondu.

mesonephric (mes'ō-nēf'rik), a. [Gr. mesonephros + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesonephron.

The mesonephric tubules extend gradually from behind forwards till they come in contact with the pronephros. Nature, Science, XXIX, 125.

mesonephron (mes'ō-nēf'ron), n.; pl. mesonephra (-rā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + νεφρός, kidney: see nephritis.] The Wolffian body proper; the central or intermediate part of the segmental organs or primitive renal organs of the embryo, between the pronephron and the metanephron, whose duct is the Wolffian duct; distinguished from pronephron and metanephron.

mesonephros (mes'ō-nēf'ros), n.; pl. mesonephroi (-roi). [NL.; see mesonephron.] Same as mesonephron. Gray, Anat. (ed. 1887), p. 133.

mesonotal (mes'ō-nōt'al), a. [Gr. mesonotum + -al.] Situated on the mesonotum; of or pertaining to the mesonotum.

mesonotum (mes'ō-nōt'um), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + νῶτος, the back.] The middle one of the three divisions of the notum of an insect, succeeding the pronotum and preceding the metanotum; the dorsal division of the mesothorax; the upper part of the middle thoracic segment. It consists typically of four sclerites, called pronotum, scutum, scutellum, and postscutellum, which may or may not be distinguishable by means of sutures between them. In Hymenoptera, Lepidoptera, and Diptera it is very large, forming the principal part of the upper surface of the thorax. In these insects its divisions are usually named without the prefix meso-. In insects having wing-covers the mesonotum is generally concealed by them, except a piece called the scutellum, which may be very small, as in most Coleoptera, or large, as in many Hemiptera.

Mesonychidae (mes'ō-nik'i-de), n. pl. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + νύχτα, night.] A family of mammals having as type the genus Mesonyx.

Mesonyx (mes'ō-niks), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + νύχτα (nyct), night: see onyx.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals, based by Cope in 1873 upon remains from the Eocene beds of Wyoming. It represents a generalized type supposed by Cope to have some relationship with existing seals. The animal had flat blunt claws and a long slender tail.

mesoparapteral (mes'ō-pā-rap'te-rāl), a. [Gr. mesoparapteron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoparapteron.

mesoparapteron (mes'ō-pā-rap'te-rōn), n.; pl. mesoparaptera (-rā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. parapteron: see parapteron.] The parapteron of the mesothoracic segment; the third sclerite of the mesopleuron.

mesophlebitis (mes'ō-flē-bi'tis), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + φλέψ (phlēps), a vein, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle coat of a vein.

mesophloeum (mes'ō-flō-ē-um), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + φλόος, bark.] In bot., the middle or green layer of bark.

mesophragm (mes'ō-frāgm), n. [NL.; see mesophragma.] Same as mesophragma.

mesophragma (mes'ō-frāgm), n.; pl. mesophragmata (-mā-tā). [NL., mesophragma, Gr. μέσος, middle, + φράγμα, partition: see diaphragm.] 1. In entom., a transverse internal partition, descending from the anterior border of the metathorax above, between the mesothorax and the metathorax, and serving for the attachment of muscles. It probably corresponds to the metaprepectum; it is often absent. — 2. In Crustacea, that process of an endosternite (or intersternite apodeme) which is directed inward to unite with its fellow and form an arch over the sternal canal. See sternal canal, under sternal.

mesophragmal (mes'ō-frāgm'al), a. [Gr. mesophragma + -al.] Pertaining to the mesophragm.

mesophyll (mes'ō-fil), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + φύλλον, leaf.] The parenchymatous tissue which lies between the epidermal layers of a flat leaf-blade; the soft inner tissue of leaves.

mesophyllum (mes'ō-fil'um), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + φύλλον, leaf.] Same as mesophyll.

mesophytum (me-sōf'i-tum), n.; pl. mesophyta (-tā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + φυτόν, a plant.] In bot., the line of demarcation between the internode and the petiole. Lindley.

mesopic (me-sōp'ik), a. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὥς (ōs), face.] Having a nasal index of from 107.5 to 110, as the negroid races; having small and moderately retreating malar bones: as, a mesopic face.

mesoplast (mes'ō-plast), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + πλάστος, verbal adj. of πλάσσω, form, mold.] Nuclear protoplasm; endoplasm; a cell-nucleus.

mesoplastic (mes'ō-plas'tik), a. [Gr. mesoplast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesoplast.

mesoplastral (mes'ō-plas'trāl), a. [Gr. mesoplastron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoplastron.

In the Pleurodira the first two families are distinguished from one another by the presence or absence of a mesoplastral bone. Nature, XL, 7.

mesoplastron (mes'ō-plas'tron), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. plastron.] A median and anterior bone or plate of the plastron developed in certain of the pleurodirous tortoises.

mesopleural (mes'ō-plō-rāl), a. [Gr. mesopleuron + -al.] In entom., intermediate and lateral, as a part of the mesothorax; of or pertaining to the mesopleuron.

mesopleuron (mes'ō-plō'rōn), n.; pl. mesopleura (-rā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + πλευρά, a rib: see pleura.] The lateral or pleural part of the mesothorax of an insect; a mesothoracic pleuron, following the propleuron and preceding the metapleuron. Each mesopleuron, right and left, is divided into three sclerites — an epipleuron, an epimeron, and a parapleuron.

Mesopodion (me-sōp'ō-di-on), n. [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὄδον, ōdos, a road, + πόδιον (podion), a foot.] A genus of eelaceans: same as Zephyrus.

mesopodion (me-sōp'ō-di-on), a. [Gr. Mesopodion + -ion.] Armed with a tooth in the middle of each side of the lower jaw: said specifically of whales of the genus Mesopodion.

mesopodia, n. Plural of mesopodium.

mesopodial (mes'ō-pō-di-āl), a. and n. [Gr. mesopodium + -al.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the mesopodium of a mollusk. — 2. n. Of or pertaining to the mesopodialia.

II. n. A mesopodial bone; one of the mesopodialia.

mesopodialia (mes'ō-pō-di-āl-i-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Marsh, 1880): see mesopodium.] The bones of the carpus and tarsus, taken together, as mutually corresponding, and as forming morphological segments of the limbs intervening between the epipodialia and the metapodialia. See epipodialia.

mesopodium (mes'ō-pō-di-um), n.; pl. mesopodia (-iā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + πόδιον (podion), a foot.] The middle one of the three parts into which the foot of some mollusks, as gastropods and pteropods, may be divided, between the propodium and the metapodium. See epipodium.

mesopostscutellar (mes'ō-post-skū'te-lār), a. [Gr. mesopostscutellum + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the mesopostscutellum.

mesopostscutellum (mes'ō-post-skū'te-l'um), n.; pl. mesopostscutella (-lā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. postscutellum, q. v.] The postscutellum of the mesonotum; the postscutellar sclerite of the mesothorax.

Mesopotamian (mek'ō-pō-tā'mi-ān), a. [Gr. Mesopotamia, Gr. Μεσopotάμια, Mesopotamia (see def.), lit. 'the land between the rivers,' Gr. μέσος, middle, + πόταμος, river.] Pertaining to Mesopotamia, the region between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates in Asia, north of Babylon. The name is sometimes extended to include Babylonia also. Mesopotamian art, a convenient general name including the kindred arts of ancient Chaldaea, Babylonia, and Assyria, though these arts were not definitely limited to Mesopotamia proper. They constitute together one of the chief divisions of art development, and exerted an important influence upon Greek art, and hence upon succeeding arts for all time. See Assyrian, Babylonian, and Chaldean.

mesopræscutal (mek'ō-prē-skū'tal), a. [Gr. mesopræscutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesopræscutum.

mesopræscutum (mek'ō-prē-skū'tum), n.; pl. mesopræscuta (-tā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. præscutum, q. v.] The præscutum of the mesothoracic segment of an insect.

mesoprosopic (mek'ō-pro-sōp'ik), a. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + πρόσκειν, proskein, to look at.] Intermediate between chama-prosopic and leptoprosopic — that is, with a face of moderate width; with a facial index of about 80.

Mesopsyche (mek'ō-psi'ke), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + ψυχή, psyche, spirit.] Haeckel's name for the midbrain or mesencephalon.

mesopterygial (mek'ō-pet'ri-j'āl), a. [Gr. mesopterygium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesopterygium.

mesopterygium (mek'ō-pet'ri-j'i-um), n.; pl. mesopterygia (-iā). [NL., Gr. μέσος, middle, +

NL. pterygium.] The middle one of several basal cartilages which the pterygium of a fish, as an elasmobranch, may present, between the propterygium and the metapterygium. See pterygium.

mesopterygoid (mes-op-ter'i-goid), n. [NL., < Gr. pteron, middle, + NL. pterygoid, q. v.] That part of the pterygium which in birds articulates with the palatal bone or with the basipterygoid process of the sphenoid, or with both.

mesopycnal (mes-o-pik'nal), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. pycnos, middle, + tektonos, a small interval in music, neut. of tekno, close.] In medical music, modes based upon a tetrachord having its half-step in the middle.

mesorchial (mes-or'ki-al), a. [mesorchium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesorchium.

mesorchium (mes-or'ki-um), n.; pl. mesorchia (-ia). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + orchis, a testicle.] In anat., the fold of peritoneum supporting the testis while in the abdomen, or as it descends into the scrotal sac.

mesorectal (mes-o-rek'tal), a. [mesorectum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesorectum.

mesorectum (mes-o-rek'tum), n.; pl. mesorecta (-ta). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. rectum, q. v.] The mesentery of the rectum; the fold of peritoneum which is reflected over part of the rectum, holding this gut in place.

mesoretina (mes-o-ret'i-na), n. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. retina, q. v.] The middle stratum, or mosaic layer, of the retina, composed of the rod and cone and nuclear layers. J. Leidy, Anat., 1889.

mesorhinal (mes-o-rin'al), a. [mesorhine + -al.] Internasal; internarial; situated between the nostrils; said specifically of the mesorhinium.

mesorhine (mes-o-rin), a. [Properly mesorrhine (cf. Gr. mesorhinus, having a middling nose), < Gr. mesos, middle, + rhinos (-rh-), nose.] Having an index ranging from 48 to 53; applied to the nose, or to a person having such a nose.

Nose small, mesorhine or leptorhine. W. H. Flower.

mesorhinian (mes-o-rin'i-an), a. [mesorhine + -ian.] Same as mesorhine. Nature, XXXV, 357.

mesorhinium (mes-o-rin'i-um), n.; pl. mesorhina (-ia). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + rhinos (-rh-), the nose.] In ornith., the part of a bird's beak which is situated between the external nostrils; the basal or internal part of the culmen. In some birds it runs up on the forehead, magnified or otherwise diversified, giving rise to the frontal shield or casque. See cuts at cutis and shield.

mesoscapula (mes-o-skap'u-lä), n.; pl. mesoscapulae (-lä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. scapula, q. v.] The spine of the scapula, considered as a median element of that bone. H. K. Parker, & Delta mesoscapulae. See delta.

mesoscapular (mes-o-skap'u-lär), a. [mesoscapula + -ar.] Of or relating to the mesoscapula.

At the scapular extremity of the clavicle there is often a piece of cartilage, considered to be segmented off from the end of the mesoscapula, and hence called mesoscapular segment. W. H. Flower mesoscuta, n. Plural of mesoscutum.

mesoscutal (mes-o-sku'tal), a. [mesoscutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoscutum.

mesoscutellar (mes-o-sku'tel-lär), a. Of or pertaining to the mesoscutellum.

mesoscutellum (mes-o-sku'tel-lum), n.; pl. mesoscutella (-lä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. scutellum, q. v.] In entom., the scutellum of the mesonotum; the scutellar sclerite of the mesothorax.

mesoscutum (mes-o-sku'tum), n.; pl. mesoscuta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. scutum, q. v.] In entom., the scutum of the mesonotum; the scutal sclerite of the mesothorax.

mesosome (mes-o-söm), a. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] In craniom., having an orbital index between 84 and 89.

Mesosemia (mes-o-sö'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] A genus of South American butterflies of the family Erycinidae. It contains many brown or blue species, striped with black, and usually having a large round black spot in the middle of the fore wing.

mesosiderite (mes-o-sid'it), n. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] A name given by G. Rose (1864) to one of three subdivisions made by him in the classification of meteoric irons, these divisions being founded on the comparative amount of iron and stony matter present. As defined by Brezina, in one of the most recent systematic classifications of the meteorites, mesosiderite is a network of iron including olivine and bronzite with more or less plagioclase, these minerals having so coarsely crystalline a texture that the characteristic structure is obscured. It forms a passage from the iron to the chondrites. The meteorite which fell at Estherville, Iowa, in 1879 is of this class. See meteorite.

mesosigmoid (mes-o-sig'oid), n. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] The mesentery of the sigmoid flexure of the intestine, between the mesocolon and the mesorectum.

mesosoma (mes-o-sö'mä), n.; pl. mesosomata (-mä-tä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] In lamellibranchiate mollusks, a middle region of the body, which gives rise to the foot and is situated between the prosoma and the metasoma.

mesosomatic (mes-o-sö-mat'ik), a. [mesosoma (-tä) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesosoma of a mollusk.

mesosperm (mes-o-spér'm), n. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] In bot., a membrane of a seed; the secundine, or second membrane from the surface.

mesospore (mes-o-spör), n. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] The middle coat or layer of a spore when it is possible to distinguish three layers, as in the spores of Onoclea Struthiopteris.

mesosporic (mes-o-spör'ik), a. [mesospora + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesospore.

mesostaphyline (mes-o-staf'i-lin), a. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] In craniom., intermediate between leptostaphyline and brachystaphyline—that is, with a palatal index of median width; having a palatal index of from 80 to 85.

mesostate (mes-o-stät), n. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] In biol., an intermediate substance or product in a series of metabolic changes.

We are thus led to the conception that the specific material of a secretion, such as the trypsin of pancreatic juice, comes from the protoplasm of the cell, through a number of intermediate substances, or mesostates, as they are called. M. Foster, Encyc. Brit., XIX, 19.

mesosterna, n. Plural of mesosternum.

mesosternal (mes-o-stér-nal), a. [mesosternum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesosternum; as, a mesosternal sternite.

mesosterneber (mes-o-stér-ne-bér), n. [mesosterna, q. v., + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] Any one of the intermediate sternobers or pieces of the breast-bone which intervene between the manubrium of the sternum and the xiphoid or ensiform appendage. There are usually several such bones in mammals and various reptiles, as the four composing the gladiolus in man.

mesosternebra (mes-o-stér-ne-brä), n.; pl. mesosternebrae (-brä). [NL.] Same as mesosterneber.

mesosternal (mes-o-stér-ne-bral), a. [mesosternebra + -al.] Pertaining to a mesosternebra.

mesosternum (mes-o-stér-num), n.; pl. mesosterna (-tä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. sternum, q. v.] 1. In anat., the piece or pieces of a breast-bone which has several segments lying between the presternum and the xiphisternum; said chiefly of the segmented sternum of mammals.

In man it is the gladiolus or body of the sternum proper as distinguished from the manubrium and the xiphoid cartilage. 2. In entom., the ventral or sternal sclerite of the mesothorax; the under-side of the mesothorax, opposite the mesonotum.

mesostethium (mes-o-sté'thi-um), n.; pl. mesostethia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] In entom., the metasternum, or large piece between the bases of the middle and the posterior legs. It is conspicuous in beetles. Kirby.

mesostylous (mes-o-sté'lus), a. [mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] Same as mid-styled. See Archrostylosum.

Mesosuchia (mes-o-sü'ki-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + sigma, a sign, mark, token.] A crocodile (a local name in Egypt). A division of crocodiles having amphicephalous vertebrae: contrasted with Eusuchia and Parasuchia.

mesosuchian (mes-o-sü'ki-an), a. [Mesosuchia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Mesosuchia.

Crocodylids have developed into the Mesosuchia group. Smith, Encyc. Brit., IX, 66.

mesosuchians (mes-o-sü'ki-ä), a. [Mesosuchia + -ous.] Same as mesosuchian.

mesotarsus (mes-o-tär'sus), n.; pl. mesotarsi (-sä). [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. tarsus, q. v.] In entom., the whole tarsus of the second or middle leg of a six-footed insect, coming between the metatarsus of the hind leg and the protarsus of the fore leg.

mesothelial (mes-o-thé-li-al), a. [mesothelium + -al.] Of or pertaining to mesothelium.

mesothelium (mes-o-thé-li-um), n. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + NL. (epi)thelium, q. v.] The epithelium lining the entire primitive coelom or body-cavity of the embryo; the coelarium.

Mesotheriidae (mes-o-thé-ri-i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Mesotherium + -idae.] A family of extinct quadrupeds from the Pliocene of South America, representing a very generalized type, allied on the one hand to the rodents and by some made a suborder, Hebidentati, of Rodentia, by others referred to the Subungulata or polydactyl ungulates. There are clavicles, as in no other known ungulates, and four lower incisors, as in no known rodents; the mandibular condyle is transverse, and the maxillaries articulate with the nasals. There are in each upper half jaw 1 incisor, no canines, 2 premolars, and 3 molars, and in each lower half jaw 2 incisors, no canines, 1 premolar, and 3 molars—in all, 24 teeth.

Mesotherium (mes-o-thé-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + thetauros, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil rodent-like ungulate quadrupeds, typical of the family Mesotheriidae, upon which is based the prime division Hebidentati. M. cristatum is the type species. Typotherium is a synonym.

mesotherm (mes-o-thér'm), n. [= F. mésotherme, < Gr. mesos, middle, + thermos, hot, thetauros, heat.] In Alphonse de Candolle's classification of plants with regard to their geographical distribution, a plant of his third "physiological group." The plants of this group require a moderate degree of heat, from 15° to 20° C. They are very numerous, including most of the plants of the warmer parts of the temperate zones of both hemispheres exclusive of the mountainous districts.

mesothesis (me-söth'e-sis), n. [mesos, middle, + thesis, a putting, proposition; see thesis.] Middle place; mean. [Rare.]

Imitation is the mesothesis of likeness and difference. Cicero.

mesothoracic (mes-o-thö-ras'ik), a. [mesothorax (-ac-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesothorax of an insect. Mesothoracic case. Same as mesothoracotheca.

mesothoracotheca (mes-o-thö'ra-kö-thö'kä), n.; pl. mesothoracothecae (-kä). [NL., < mesothorax (-ac-) + Gr. theka, a case.] In entom., the mesothoracic case, or that part of the integument of a pupa covering the mesothorax. In the Lepidoptera and Diptera the other thoracic cases are indistinguishable from this, and it is then called the thoracotheca.

mesothorax (mes-o-thö'raks), n. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + thorax, chest; see thorax.] In entom., the second or middle one of the three divisions of the thorax, situated between the prothorax and the metathorax, and bearing the second pair of legs and the first pair of wings. When very large, as in dipterous insects, it is simply called the thorax.

mesotrocha (me-söt'rö-kä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. mesos, middle, + trochos, anything round or circular; see trochae.] Ciliated embryos of polychaetous annelids in which one of many bands of cilia encircle the middle of the body. See atrocha, telotrocha.

mesotrochal (me-söt'rö-käl), a. [mesotrocha + -al.] Pertaining to or resembling mesotrocha; mesotrochous.

The actively locomotive embryo of Rhipunculus . . . resembles a Rotifer or a mesotrochal annelidus larva. Huxley, Anal. Invert., p. 217.

mesotrochous (me-söt'rö-kus), a. [As mesotrocha + -ous.] Same as mesotrochal.

mesotympanic (mes-o-tim-pän'ik), a. and n. [mesos, middle, + tympanon, a drum (mesotympanum), + -ic.] 1. a. Situated in the Sternum of winged insect, showing mesosternum and xiphisternum.

Sw.* Messias, < L. Messias, < Gr. Messias, < Heb. Mishach, anointed, < mashach, anoint.] A designation of Jesus as the Saviour of the world; the Hebrew equivalent of Christ, the Anointed, but used more frequently as a descriptive title (the Messiah) than as a name: from prophetic passages in the Hebrew Scriptures (where, except in two instances in Daniel, it is translated Anointed, often as a noun) interpreted by Jesus and by Christians as referring to him and universal in scope, but regarded by the Jews as promising a divinely sent deliverer for their own race. This belief in a coming Messiah is still held as a doctrine by many Jews, and at various periods of the Christian era impostors have assumed the name and character, and have had many adherents. The title is also applied figuratively to historical characters who have been great deliverers. Sometimes written, after the Greek of the New Testament, Messias.

We have found Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ.
John 1. 41.

In the High Church of Jerusalem, the Christians were but another Sect of Jews, that did believe the Messias was come.

mester, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of master, mister.

mester, n. A variant of mister.

messful, a. [Var. of messive, with substituted suffix -ful.] Sad; gloomy. [Rare.]

Among all other birds
 Most messful birds am I.
 Among all feathered fowls
 I first complain and cry.
Kendall, Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

messif, n. An obsolete variant of mastiff.

messive (mes'tiv), a. [L. messus, messus, sad, mournful (< marere, marere, be sad, mourn), + E. -ive. Cf. messful.] Sad; sorrowful; gloomy; dismal.

The Melancholy's messive, and too full
 Of fearful thoughts, and cares unrequit.
Darwin, Microcosm, p. 31. (Darwin.)

mestizo (mes-tē-zō), n. [G. mestizo, < Sp. mestizo = OF. metis, F. metis, mixed, mongrel; see mastiff.] The offspring of a person of mixed blood; especially, a person of mixed Spanish and American Indian parentage.

To Mexico there is such a great resort, that all the towns thereabout which were formerly of Indians are now inhabited by Spaniards and Mestizos.
S. Clarke, Geographical Description, etc. (1671), p. 261.

He [Mr. Werner] also saw something of Tipoo Tip during the expeditions between the Falls and Bartlett's camp on the Aruimi, but was not very favourably impressed by that wily mestizo.
The Academy, June 20, 1890, p. 441.

mestling, n. See maslin.

mestling, n. See maslin.

mestlion, mestlyon, n. See maslin.

mestome (mes'tōm), n. [NL. (Schwendener), appar. < Gr. μωστωμα, fullness, < μωστω, full.] In bot., that part of a fibrovascular bundle whose function is mainly conduction.

To the elements which impart strength to a bundle Schwendener has given the name stereome; to the other parts of the bundle, mesome.
Goodale, Physiological Botany, p. 193.

Mesua (mes'ü-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), named after Mesuah, an Arabian physician of the 8th and 9th centuries.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Rutaceae and the tribe Cakophylleae, characterized by an ovary which is two-celled and contains four ovules, and by a shield-shaped stigma. They are shrubs or trees with very narrow leaves and large solitary flowers. Eight species have been enumerated, all from tropical Asia, but the number is probably reducible to three. M. ferrea, one of the ironwoods, is common in the East Indies, wild and cultivated. It is a straight, erect tree with elegant foliage and large four-petaled flowers, pure white and fragrant. They afford a native dye and perfume, and are exported, mostly for the latter purpose, under the name mesua. The seeds yield a dark thick oil (mesuam or mahor oil) which is suitable for machinery, railroad-ties, etc.; it is also used for tool-handles and the like.

able, and which possesses opacity, luster of a peculiar kind (commonly called metallic), because very characteristic of the metals), conductivity for heat and electricity, and plasticity, or capability of being drawn, squeezed, or hammered with change of shape but no loss of continuity. Examples of metals possessing all these qualities although in varying degree are gold, silver, copper, iron, lead and tin all of which have been known from remote antiquity and on the characters which they possess the idea of a metal was and mainly still is, founded. These metals also have a high specific gravity, the lightest of them (tin) being over seven times as dense as water. Of the prehistorically known metals gold, silver, and copper occur more or less abundantly in the native or metallic form, and must have been noticed, and to all probability utilized in the most remote antiquity, by various nations and over widely extended areas. Iron also occurs native especially in the form of meteoric iron, and in this way may have first become known and utilized. But iron is now and has been from time immemorial, smelted from its ores in countries which from almost every other point of view than the metallurgical, might properly be regarded as uncivilized. The use of iron other than in this way was not, however, known in the New World before the advent of European. Tin and lead do not occur in the metallic form in nature unless in very minute quantities hence where used, these metals must have been obtained by the metallurgical treatment of their ores. In the case of tin and zinc as well as of other metals not occurring native, it was not until long after some knowledge had been attained in regard to the practical use of them, either by themselves or as ingredients in various alloys that any accurate idea was obtained of the metals themselves. Thus brass was certainly made long before anything definite had been learned in regard to the metal zinc, and it is not at all unlikely that the same was the case with bronze and the cuprum tinctorium. In addition to the six metals already mentioned quicksilver was known to the Greeks and Romans in classical times, and this metal also occurs not infrequently in the metallic form so that its early discovery is not a matter to excite surprise. The anomalous occurrence of quicksilver as a liquid at the ordinary temperature was the reason why it that it may not belong to the class of metals, and among the metals it was not included by writers on chemistry until metallurgy until after it had been discovered that this fluid could be frozen at a not very low temperature, and that when frozen it was malleable. It was not until the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that antimony, bismuth and zinc became known, but their uses had long been known although in the case of the former metal only to a very limited extent. The discovery of these metals considerably enlarged the scope of the word metallum since it became necessary to admit that metals could be brittle; this was still further exemplified in the case of the metal arsenic discovered in 1250 (it is oxidized to arsenic acid) and long known and utilized, which, although having a metallic luster is decidedly brittle. This brittleness of substances otherwise metallic in appearance led to their being placed in a class by themselves as semi-metals, the idea that malleability was a necessary attribute of a metal having come down from the Arabian chemists, and maintaining its hold for many centuries. About the middle and in the latter half of the eighteenth century the number of known metals was greatly increased. In 1741 platinum was discovered but the metals which are always associated with it—osmium, iridium, rhodium, ruthenium etc. were not detected until much later. At about the same time as platinum, nickel and cobalt were recognized as elements that were first separated and distinguished from their ores, which had been long known and in the case of cobalt at least utilized to a limited extent. Toward the end of the eighteenth century manganese was by Lavoisier, tellurium, niobium, titanium and chromium became known. About the beginning of the nineteenth century several of the metals of the platinum family—palladium, iridium, osmium, rhodium—were separated from the complex alloy known as native platinum. Up to this time all the known substances to which the name metal was applied were much heavier than water and decidedly heavier than the so-called gases or non-metals. Hence as the old and long prevailing idea that all metals were malleable had been done away with a high specific gravity began to be considered as the most important characteristic. Thus we find Cronstedt, who was one of the earliest systematic writers on mineralogy (the first edition of his work was published in 1756), defining metals as those mineral bodies which with respect to their volume are the heaviest of all hitherto known bodies. With the discovery, by Davy in 1807, of the metallic nature of the bases of the alkalis a great change took place in this respect for these substances, metallic from many points of view, especially with reference to their chemical affinities, are lighter than water and at first on this account were by some chemists not admitted to rank as metals. The discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalis was followed by that of the bases of the earths—calcium, barium and strontium 1807, aluminum 1824, aluminium, gallium and yttrium 1825. These metals are all light as compared with the older metals but heavy in comparison with the metallic bases of the alkalis, the lightest of which—lithium discovered in 1817—has only a little more than half the specific gravity of water (sodium, another heavy metal associated with zinc in its mode of occurrence and of some importance in the arts, was also separated from its oxide in 1819). Many metals have been discovered within the past few years all of great interest from the scientific point of view but none of them of economical importance, or occurring in sufficient quantity to be utilized to any extent even if possessing valuable properties. No doubt and difficult are the chemical reactions of some of these elements that their exact number cannot be stated. Several have been worked over by chemists for years without any definite conclusion having been reached, even after having been accepted for a while—have been dropped from the list. There are about seventy generally recognized elements (see element), although some three or four of these may still be considered as more or less doubtful. Of the seventy thirteen are decidedly non-metals, the rest are sulphur, phosphorus, silica, chlorine, iodine, bromine, arsenic, boron, nitrogen, hydrogen, oxygen, and selenium; all the other elements are considered to be metals, and selenium was formerly generally so considered, but latterly it has been decidedly included among the non-metals, and the name has been changed by some to telonium, to make it correspond with carbon, boron, and arsenic, with which elements it is to a certain extent chemically allied. Tellurium, on the other hand, although closely related chemically to sulphur and selenium, has always been classed among the metals, chiefly because, although brittle, it has a decided metallic luster. The names of the metals, so far as is possible, all end in -um; even platinum is frequently written platinum. A division of the elements into metals and non-metals is recognized by chemists at the present time as being rather a matter of convenience from the popular point of view than as one capable of exact scientific definition. The words metalliferous and metal, however, cannot be dispensed with in common life and the arts, and their use can very rarely lead to any confusion. The exceptions to this general statement that the metals have a "metallic" luster, and that the non-metals do not, are, on the whole, extremely insignificant. Only in the case of selenium and phosphorus in certain of their allotropic forms could there be any question as to whether the term metallic luster could properly be used with reference to a non-metal.

3. In printing and type-founding. See type-metal.—3. The material of glass, pottery, etc., in a state of fusion.

If no tongues of flame make their appearance, the calcination is complete. The contents of the pot are then shovelled out, and allowed to cool and harden into what is technically called metal or "prussiate cake."

Spence's Encyc. Manuf., I. 270.

White glass or enamel is made by adding either arsenic or the oxide of tin to the melted metal.

4. pl. The rails of a railway. [Colloq.]

He stood obstinately on the metals until the train came up and cut him to pieces.

C. Morris, Gates of Hell, p. 25.

5. In her., one of the two tinctures or and argent—that is, gold and silver.—6. Materials for roads; especially, the broken stones used as ballasting on a road-bed or railway.—7. The aggregate number, mass, or effective power of the guns carried by a ship of war.

Oblivious by looking that British man-of-war well over. Does she carry more metal than the President?

Julius Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 282.

8. That of which anything is composed; formative material; hence, constitution; intrinsic quality, as of a person.

As his mettle is tempered and qualified, so are his speeches and language at large, and his inward conceits be the mettle of his mind, and his manner of utterance the very warp and woof of his conceits.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 124.

Mr. I am made
Of the self-same mettle that my sister is.
Shak., Lear, I. 1. 71.

9. Courage; spirit; mettle. In this mettle we now always mettle.

Being glad to find their companions had so much mettle, after a long debate the major part carried it.

Clarendon, Civil War.

10. A mine. Darwin.

It was impossible to live without our king but as slaves live: that is, such as are visibly dead, and persons condemned to mettle.

Jer. Taylor, Doctor Dubitantium, Ep. 164.

Alch metal, or Alch's metal, an alloy of about two parts of zinc with three of copper, to which about two per cent. of iron is added. This alloy is very malleable at a red heat, and can be hammered, rolled, or drawn into fine wire. It has been used in Austria for cannon, and is believed to have been known to the Chinese. Antifriction metals. See antifriction. Babbitt metal. [Named from Isaac Babbitt, the inventor (1796-1857).] An alloy of tin with copper and antimony, used for bearings, bushings, or pillow-blocks. This alloy consists of 88 per cent. of tin, the remaining 12 per cent. being made up of the two other metals. Sometimes called babbittizing.—Base metals, in met., the metals not classed as noble, especially lead, zinc, copper, and iron.—Bath metal. [Named from Bath, England.] A white brass consisting of 55 parts of copper and 45 of zinc. The name is also given to other combinations of the same metals.—Blue metal. (a) A well-baked name for blue clay. (b) See blue.—Bowl-metal, a name given to antimony in the second stage of the English smelting process of that metal.—Britannia metal, an alloy containing tin, antimony, and copper, to which bismuth, zinc, and lead are occasionally added. The essential metal is tin, which usually constitutes nine tenths or more of the mass, the antimony and copper being added to give the desired hardness. This alloy is extensively used for tableware, being usually, for that purpose, covered with a thin coating of silver, and sold as silver-plate. In the best plated ware, however, the silver is laid on a body of German silver.—Coarse metal, the technical name of the product of the second operation in the process of smelting mixed cupriferosus ores in Great Britain, especially at Swansea. The product of this operation, which is performed in a reverberatory furnace, is a matte or regulus containing iron and copper in combination with sulphur in about the same proportion in which they are present in copper pyrites, together with slag.—Composition metal. See composition.—Dutch metal, the Dutch.—Fusible metal, a metallic alloy that fuses at a very low temperature. Such alloys are usually composed of lead, tin, and bismuth. Among these best known are—Rose's metal, containing 5 parts of bismuth, 5 of lead, and 5 of tin, which fuses at 300°; Rose's metal, 5 parts of bismuth, 1 each of tin and lead, fusing at 301°; and an alloy of 5 parts of bismuth, 3 of lead, and 2 of tin, fusing at 187°. The addition of cadmium to alloys of bismuth, tin, and lead lowers their fusing-point considerably. Thus, if from 8 to 10 per cent. of cadmium is added to Rose's metal, the melting-point is reduced to 187°. The alloys known as Wood's and Wood and Lipinsky's metals are such alloys of cadmium, bismuth, tin, and lead. One of these, containing cadmium 4 parts, and tin, lead, and bismuth each 5 parts, melts at 160°. The addition of mercury to fusible alloys like Newton's and Rose's metals is said also to lower their fusing-point considerably.—Gathered metal. See gathered metal, under lead.—Geddes's metal. Same as Edg's metal.—Heavy metal. See heavy.—Kier's metal, a gun-metal composed of 100 parts of copper, 75 of zinc, and 16 of iron, of which the specific gravity is less than 8.—Magnetic metal, iron, nickel, cobalt, chromium, and manganese.—Muntz's metal. [Named from Mr. Muntz of Birmingham, the inventor.] Yellow metal; an alloy of 3 parts of copper and 2 of zinc, differing from common brass in being malleable when hot. It is cheaper and can be more easily rolled than copper, and has taken its place as the material used for sheathing, formerly one of the most important uses to which copper was put. Yellow metal is its general commercial name. Also called patent metal.—Newton's metal. See fusible metal, above.—Noble or perfect metals, gold, silver, and platinum; so called because when exposed to the air they do not oxidize like other metals, but retain their metallic luster.—Organ- or pipe-metal, an alloy of tin and lead, with or without zinc used for the construction of organ pipes. The value of the metal depends principally upon the proportion of tin used, less than 50 per cent. making poor metal. A fair percentage of tin is indicated by a spotted surface, hence good metal is also called spotted metal. Patent metal. Same as Muntz's metal.—Pimple-metal. See white metal.—Point of fusion of metals. See fusion.—Prince's metal, an alloy said to have been so called because first prepared by Prince Rupert (1619-82), nephew of Charles I. of England, who invented, or at least introduced into England, the so-called "Prince Rupert's drops." There is no certainty in regard to the composition of the alloy called prince's metal. By most writers it is said to have been a kind of brass; others describe it as an alloy of copper and arsenic.—Rose's metal. See fusible metal, above.—To burn metals together. See burn.—White metal, the product of the fourth operation in the smelting of mixed cupriferosus ores according to the English process. The object of this stage of the process is to remove the iron, and the work is done in a reverberatory furnace, the third stage having been a calcination of the coarse metal, with the object of converting the sulphuret of iron into an oxide. The product of the fourth operation is variously designated as blue, white, or pimple metal, according to the percentage of copper contained and the peculiar appearance exhibited. Portions having a smooth lustrous fracture, and containing from 80 to 70 per cent. of copper, are designated as white metal, those of grayish white color with granular fracture, and containing from 75 to 78 per cent. of copper, are called blue metal. Pimple metal is that which contains more than 78 per cent. of copper, and has its surface pimpled from the escape of sulphurous acid gas.—Wood's metal. See fusible metal, above.—Yellow metal. Same as Muntz's metal.

metal (met'al), v. t.; pret. and pp. metaled or metalled, pp. metaling or metalling. [met'al, n.] To put metal on; cover, as roads, with broken stones or metal.

metal. An abbreviation of metallurgy. metal-bath (met'al-bath), n. See bath. metal-casting (met'al-kast'ing), n. 1. The act or process of producing casts in metal by pouring it when in a state of fusion into a mold.—2. A piece of cast metal having a form that adapts it for use in machinery, manufactures, etc.

metaldelude (me-tal'de-lud), n. [Gr. meta, with, + E. aldehyde.] A substance into which aldehyde is partially converted in contact with acids at a low temperature. It is a white crystalline solid.

metaled, metalled (met'alid), a. 1. Covered with metal, especially with road-metal or ballast; macadamized; as, newly metaled roads.—2. Full of fire or ardor; mettled; dazzling; glancing. See mettled.

I hate such moun'd, give me metall'd fire,
That trembles in the blaze, but then mounts higher
B. Jonson, Epigram to William Lake of New castle [on London].

metalepsis (met-a-lep'sis), n. [L. < Gr. meta, with, + Gr. leipsis, participation, assumption, alternation, < meta, partaken in, < meta, partaken in, < meta, among, + leipsis, take.] A rhetorical figure or trope assumed by some ancient writers, and supposed to consist in substituting a word for a synonym or homonym, which latter is at the same time understood in a metaphorical or transferred sense; as, "sable caverns" for "black caverns," thus in its turn meaning "dark or gloomy caverns."

The sense is much altered & the hearers conceit strangely entangled by the figure Metalepsis, which I call the farfel.
Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 132.

metalepsy (met-a-lep'si), n. [Gr. meta, with, + Gr. lepsis, participation, assumption, alternation, < meta, partaken in, < meta, partaken in, < meta, among, + lepsis, take.] A rhetorical figure or trope assumed by some ancient writers, and supposed to consist in substituting a word for a synonym or homonym, which latter is at the same time understood in a metaphorical or transferred sense; as, "sable caverns" for "black caverns," thus in its turn meaning "dark or gloomy caverns."

The sense is much altered & the hearers conceit strangely entangled by the figure Metalepsis, which I call the farfel.
Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 132.

metalepsy (met-a-lep'si), n. [Gr. meta, with, + Gr. lepsis, participation, assumption, alternation, < meta, partaken in, < meta, partaken in, < meta, among, + lepsis, take.] A rhetorical figure or trope assumed by some ancient writers, and supposed to consist in substituting a word for a synonym or homonym, which latter is at the same time understood in a metaphorical or transferred sense; as, "sable caverns" for "black caverns," thus in its turn meaning "dark or gloomy caverns."

The sense is much altered & the hearers conceit strangely entangled by the figure Metalepsis, which I call the farfel.
Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 132.

metalepsy (met-a-lep'si), n. [Gr. meta, with, + Gr. lepsis, participation, assumption, alternation, < meta, partaken in, < meta, partaken in, < meta, among, + lepsis, take.] A rhetorical figure or trope assumed by some ancient writers, and supposed to consist in substituting a word for a synonym or homonym, which latter is at the same time understood in a metaphorical or transferred sense; as, "sable caverns" for "black caverns," thus in its turn meaning "dark or gloomy caverns."

metaleptic (met-a-lep'tik), a. [Gr. meta, with, + Gr. lepsis, participation, assumption, alternation, < meta, partaken in, < meta, partaken in, < meta, among, + lepsis, take.] Pertaining to a metalepsis or participation; transitive.—2. Transverse; as, the metaleptic motion of a muscle.—3. In chem., pertaining to, resulting from, or characterized by metalepsy, or the substitution of one substance for another which has been displaced.

metaleptical (met-a-lep'ti-kal), a. [metaleptic + -al.] Same as metaleptic.

metaleptically (met-a-lep'ti-kal-i), adv. In a metaleptic manner; by transposition.

The name of pronouns may metaleptically be extended to cumulations. Sp. Sanderson, Trinitarian Catech., l. 48.

metal-gage (met'al-gaj), n. A gage used for determining the thickness of sheet-metal. E. H. Knight.

metalline (met'al-in), n. [met'al + -ine.] 1. A kind of thread for sewing leather, made of twisted strands of linen and brass, copper, or steel wire.—2. A compound for forming a lubricating-surface in journal-boxes. It is made up of metallic oxides, organic materials, wax, and fatty matters.

metaling, metalling (met'al-ing), n. [Verbal n. of metal, v.] The material which forms the road-bed of a macadamized road or of a railway, chiefly broken stones; road-metal.

The air is filled with a choking precipitate of the kun-ker, or carbonate of lime nodules, which form the metaling of the road. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 146.

metallist, n. See metallist.

metallic (me-tal'ik), a. [F. metallique = Sp. metalico = Pg. It. metallico (cf. D. metallisch, metalisch = G. metallisch = Dan. Sw. metallisk), < L. metallus, < Gr. meta, with, + Gr. tallos, of or concerning a mine or metal, < tallos, a mine (metal); see metal, n.] 1. Consisting of or having the characters of a metal; made up of metal or of an alloy. This word is used to indicate the condition of a metal (see metal) in which it exists by itself, and not mineralized or combined with those substances which take away its metallic character and convert it into an ore, in which the elementary substance exists, but often with characters greatly differing from those which it has when separated from its mineralizers, or reduced to the metallic form.

She said: and lo! a palace towering seems,
With Pillars pillars and metallic beams.
W. King, Rufina, or the Favourite.

Among the most metallic of the metals is a gas.
J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 107.

2. Characteristic of a metal: as, a metallic luster.—3. Having one or more properties resembling those of metals: as, a metallic voice.

A distinct, hollow, metallic, and clangorous, yet apparently muffled, reverberation.

Poe, Fall of the House of Usher.

Metallic-adamantine luster, a variety of luster intermediate between submetallic and adamantine, characteristic of pyrophyllite, some corundum and octahedrite, etc.—Metallic ammonium, bur, currency, dust, feather. See the nouns.

Metallic beetles, a collectors name for coleopterous insects of the family Hydrophilidae. See cut under Hydrophilidae. Metallic bath. See bathing.—Metallic oxid, a compound of metal and oxygen. Metallic paper, paper the surface of which is washed over with a solution of whiting, lime, and size. Writing done with a powder pencil upon such paper is almost indelible.—Metallic salts, those salts which have a metal or metallic oxid for their base, as lead carbonate. Metallic scales. See metallic feather, under feather. Metallic standard. See standard. Metallic tinkling, in pathol., a high pitched tinkle heard in the lungs in pneumothorax, or in the case of a lung cavity under certain conditions. Metallic-tissue loom. See loom.

metallically (me-tal'i-kal-i), a. [metallus + -al.] Same as metallic.

Now, by electrical bodies, I understand not such as are metallically, mentioned by Pliny and the Antients.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 4.

metallically (me-tal'i-kal-i), adv. As a metal; by means of or by the use of metal; with a metal; as regards metallic properties.

They [two plates of different metals] are metallically connected together. Proctor and Smeaton, Telegraphy, p. 8.

Let us conceive a metallically pure cylinder of wrought or cast iron.
Eng. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 204.

metallicity (me-tal'i-si-ti), n. [metallus + -ity.] The condition of being a metal; metallic character or constitution.

They [the alchemists] held that mercury enters into the composition of all metals, and is the very basis of their metallicity. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 32.

metallifacure (met'al-i-fak'jur), n. [L. metallum, a metal, + factura, a making; see facture.] The manufacture of metals. [Italo.]

metalliferous (met-a-lif'e-rus), a. [F. metallifer = Sp. metallifero; < L. metallifer, yielding metals, < metallum, a metal, + ferre = E. bear.]

metamorphism (met-a-môr'fizm), n [As metamorph-ic + -ism.] The process of metamorphoning, or changing the form or structure; specifically, chemical change and rearrangement of the constituents of a rock by which they are made to assume new forms and enter into new combinations, the most important result of these changes being that the rock becomes harder and more crystalline in structure. Thus, the metamorphic states are crystalline schists. The sedimentary rocks, especially those made up of the debris of feldspathic minerals, are those most liable to undergo metamorphism; hence it is that the argillaceous rocks offer the most conspicuous examples of this process, and it is these which are most altered in external characters by it, foliation and slaty cleavage being often highly developed in the process. Volcanic rocks also are subject to metamorphic changes, although the results are usually much less conspicuous to the eye unaided by a microscope than in the case of the sedimentary deposits. Examples of metamorphism are the conversion of ordinary earthy limestone into crystalline marble, of argillaceous shales into various kinds of schists (mica-schist, talc-schist, etc.), and of sandstone into quartzite. Closely connected with the phenomena of metamorphism is the development in a rock of a slaty cleavage or of a foliated structure. Metamorphic agencies and the results which they have brought about have been much studied of late years by geologists, and the modern methods of lithological research have been most important aids in this direction. The most obvious and generally accepted classification of metamorphic action is into "contact" and "regional" metamorphism. In the case of contact metamorphism the changes observed are apparently due—in large part, at least—to the presence of an adjacent mass of rock, usually of an intrusive character, as when the strata are seen to have been altered along the walls of a dike. In the case of regional metamorphism when large masses of rock are found to have been affected and rendered crystalline without any special cause being visible in the form of adjacent intrusive or igneous material, the phenomena are more difficult of explanation than in the case of contact metamorphism. In the course of the numerous discussions of this subject a great number of new terms have been introduced, the meaning of which is, owing to the complexity of the phenomena and the imperfection of the observations, often rather obscure; some of these terms may here be cited. As synonyms of "regional" metamorphism, the epithets "normal" and "general" have been used by some authors, while others have indicated a desire to specialize in their application. Thus, Freewick limits "normal metamorphism" to the changes due to central heat, and "regional metamorphism" to changes effected by the heat produced locally within the crust of the earth by transformation into heat of the mechanical work of compression or of crushing of parts of the earth. Bouvier desires to reserve the phrase "regional metamorphism" for those ancient rocks occupying extensive areas of the earth's surface "which, whatever be their history, are in all probability by no means in their original condition." Dana prefers "local" to "contact," but does not use the two exactly as synonyms, since he makes local "include changes due to heated emanations and other conditions where there are no contacts." In other words, he uses "local" rather as the opposite of "general," ignoring the idea embodied in the term "contact," namely that a visible cause of the observed metamorphism is present in the form of an adjacent mass of intrusive or heterogeneous rock. Kinahan proposes "metapapais" and "parapapais" as the synonyms of "glacial and contact metamorphism." "Why we need go to the Greek for [the] two words is not clear." (Dana.) Many geologists are of the opinion that the movements which the rocks comprising the earth's crust have undergone in certain regions, which movements must necessarily have been accompanied by pressure, stress, shearing, or "flow," have been among the most important causes of metamorphic change. The most comprehensive term by which metamorphism originating in conditions of this kind has been designated is that introduced by Roemer, "dynamical." Other writers on this subject have used as being nearly or quite synonymous with "dynamical" the following: "pressure," "compression," "mechanical," "friction," "dislocation." Judd has introduced the term "statistical metamorphism" as indicating changes which may have taken place in deep seated rocks quite independently of any movement to which they have been subjected. As designating and discriminating between various kinds of metamorphic changes, with special reference to the character of the results produced, Dana has introduced the terms "crystalline," "paramorphic," and "metachemic." The first of these implies a simple development of a crystalline condition in the original material, such, for instance, as takes place in the conversion of limestone into marble ("marmorosis" of Geikie); the second, a change from one paramorphous state to another, as from augite to hornblende; the third, a change through chemical transformations, as of chrysotile to serpentine. "Metasomatic metamorphism" (or, in one word, "metasomatism") and "metathesis" are terms which have been suggested in this connection, but which have met with little favor; they were apparently intended by their authors to include chemical changes similar to those which take place in the formation of pseudomorphs, and are allied to the "metaschemic" of Dana. "Metastasis" and "metacrisis" are terms which have been coined, but have not become current—the one to denote changes somewhat similar to those included by "metachemic," the other (as defined by that author) to "denote changes like the conversion of a mass of mud into a mass of quartz with mica and other silicates."

metamorphize (met-a-môr'fiz), v. t.: pret. and pp. metamorphized, prp. metamorphizing. [A metamorphose + -ize.] To change; transform; metamorphose. De Quincey.

metamorphology (met-a-môr-fol'ô-jî), n. [(Gr. μεταμορφωσις), a transformation (see metamorphosis), + -logy, cf. -ology.] In bot., the science of the metamorphoses or changes which an individual undergoes from the time it ceases to be an embryo to the time it ceases to live as a bodily organism. Metamorphology and embryology together constitute ontogeny.

As soon as the organism has left [the egg-coverings], it is no longer an embryo. The later changes of this form the subject of the science of metamorphosis, or metamorphology. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.) II. 400.

metamorphopsia (met-a-môr-fop'si-â), n. [(Gr. μεταμορφωσις), transformation (see metamorphosis), + ôps, eye.] A pathological condition of the eyes in which objects appear elongated, irregular, or confused.

metamorphoscope (met-a-môr-fô-skôp), n. [(Gr. μεταμορφωσις), transformation (see metamorphosis), + skôp, view.] A toy in which pictured forms of human beings or other animals are made to interchange heads, bodies, legs, or wearing-apparel. The pictures are drawn or painted on a series of bands of muslin or paper, each having independent motion on rollers in a box, and each of a different length from the others. The bands are arranged with their edges as near together as possible, and the figures are painted across the entire series. The motion of the bands is made constantly to displace the parts of the different figures and recombine them in ludicrous fashion at a slot in the cover of the box.

metamorphoset (met-a-môr-fô-s), n. [F. métamorphose = Sp. metamorfosis or metamorfosis = Pg. metamorphose = It. metamorfosi.] cf. metamorphosis, (Gr. μεταμορφωσις), a transformation; see metamorphosis.] A transformation in shape or character; metamorphosis.

My metamorphose is not held unfit.

Middleton, Family of Love, IV. 2.

metamorphose (met-a-môr-fôz), v. t.: pret. and pp. metamorphosed, prp. metamorphosing. [= F. métamorphoser; cf. metamorphose, n., metamorphosis.] To change into a different form; alter or modify the shape or character of; transform; transmute.

Thus men (my lord) be metamorphosed,
From seemly shape, to hyrds, and ougly bests.

Macbeth, Complaint of Philomena.

Thou, Julia, thou hast metamorphosed me

Shak., T. of V., I. 1. 66.

The priest was metamorphosed into knight.

Brooking, Ring and Book, I. 180.

= Syn. Transmute, etc. See transform.

metamorphoser (met-a-môr-fô-zér), n. One who or that which metamorphoses.

What shall I name this man but a beastly metamorphoser, both of himself and of others?

Quincey, Delicate Diet for Dunc. Acadies.

metamorphosis (met-a-môr-fô-sis), n. [(Gr. μεταμορφωσις), transformation (see metamorphose + -is).] Causing metamorphosis; transforming; relating to or depicting metamorphoses.

All the metamorphosis fables of the ancients, turning polluted and commercial people into horrid and savage monsters, will be clouds before the sun, dispel and evaporate before the light of truth.

Prædell, On Antiquities, p. 60. (Latham.)

metamorphosis (met-a-môr-fô-sis), n.: pl. metamorphoses (-sez). [Formerly also metamorphose, q. v.; cf. L. metamorphosis, (Gr. μεταμορφωσις), a transformation, (Gr. μεταμορφωσις), be transformed, cf. μετα, over + μορφή, form, shape.] 1. Change of form or structure; transmutation or transformation. Used most frequently in literature with reference to the old or poetic conception of a miraculous transmutation of a person, animal, or thing into a different and often antagonistic or contrasting form, either with or without a corresponding change of nature.

With severus she along doth go,

Her Metamorphosis to show

Drayton, Polydillon, VI. Arg.

I wondered at such a Metamorphosis in so short a time;
he told me it was for the Death of his Wife that Nature had thus antedated his Years. Danell, Letters, I. 19. 26.

Where is the gloriously decisive change,

The immeasurable metamorphosis

Of human clay to divine gold

Brooking, Ring and Book, II. 217.

2. A marked change in the form or function of a living body; a transformation resulting from development; specifically, in zool., the course of alteration which an animal undergoes after its exclusion from the egg, and which modifies extensively the general form and life of the individual; particularly, in entom., the transformations of a metabolous insect.

The term metamorphosis, in its technical entomological sense, is applied only to that succession of changes of which . . . a definite pupal condition forms the middle term.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 361.

3. In chem., that chemical action by which a given compound is caused, by the presence of a peculiar substance, to resolve itself into two or more compounds, as sugar, by the presence of yeast, into alcohol and carbonic acid.—4. In bot., the various changes that are brought about in plant-organs, whereby they appear under changed or modified conditions, as when stamens are metamorphosed into petals, or stipules into leaves. Metamorphosis does not imply that the petal, for example, has ever been a stamen, but it implies an alteration in the organizing force, which took effect at a very early period in the life of the organ, at or before the time when the primitive aggregation of cells became differentiated into the several parts of which it is normally composed. It is due merely to the fact that the development of the organ has pursued a different course from what is usual. The various kinds of metamorphoses are described under the names of chlorosis, senescence, phyllody, stipulody, sepalody, staminody, etc. (which see).—Coarctate metamorphosis. See coarctate.—Complete metamorphosis. See holometaboly and complete.—Imperfect or incomplete metamorphosis. See hemimetaboly and imperfect.—Metamorphosis of organs, in bot., the progressive adaptation of one organ to several different purposes, connected with which are changes in size, color, and other particulars. Thus, all the parts of a plant are reducible to the axis and its appendages, the other parts developing themselves from these. See morphology.—Progressive metamorphosis, transformation from a lower or more simple to a higher or more complex substance; anabollism.—Retrospective metamorphosis, transformation from a higher or more complex to a lower or more simple substance; catabollism. Often called retrograde metamorphosis. = Syn. 1. See transform, v. t.

metamorphostical (met-a-môr-fô-ti-kal), a. [Irreg. cf. metamorphosis + -ic + -al.] Pertaining to or effected by metamorphosis. Pope, metamorphotic (met-a-môr-fô-tik), a. [cf. metamorphosis + -ic + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metamorphosis; consisting in transformation.

The epithelial cells lining the uriniferous tubules undergo metamorphotic changes. N. Y. Med. Jour., XI. 402.

Metamorphotic system, in entom., a scheme of classification first proposed by Swammerdam, based on the characters of the metamorphoses and the condition of the larva and pupa, whether resembling the adult or differing from it more or less widely. This scheme, improved by subsequent authors and combined with characters drawn from the study of perfect insects, is the basis of the best modern systems of entomological classification.

metamorph (met-a-môr-f), n. [(Gr. μετά, beyond + μορφή, form).] Same as metamorphosis, 4.

metanauplius (met-a-nâ'pli-us), n.: pl. metanauplia (-i). [NL., cf. Gr. μετά, after + ΝΑΪ, nauplius, q. v.] A later stage in the development of some crustaceans, after the first nauplius form, and before the zoea stage is reached; a crustacean of this later naupliiform character.

metanephron (met-a-nêf'ron), n.: pl. metanephra (-râ). [NL., cf. Gr. μετά, behind + νεφρός, kidney; see nephritis.] The most posterior and latest-formed segment of an embryonic renal organ, or section of the Wolffian body from which the permanent kidney is derived, and whose duct becomes a ureter; distinguished from pronephron and mesonephron.

metanotal (met-a-nô'tal), a. [cf. metanotum + -al.] Situated on or pertaining to the metanotum; as, a metanotal sclerite.

metanotum (met-a-nô'tum), n.: pl. metanota (-tâ). [NL., cf. Gr. μετά, behind + νῶτον, vôtôn, the back.] The dorsal part of the metathorax of an insect, succeeding the mesonotum and preceding the abdomen; the third and last segment of the notum. It is divided typically into four sclerites, called praescutum, scutum, scutellum, and postscutellum, most of which are usually distinguishable. Lateral callousities of the metanotum. See lateral.

metapapapleral (met-a-pâ'pâ'pâ'le-râ), a. [cf. metapapapleron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapapapleron.

metapapapleron (met-a-pâ'pâ'pâ'le-rôn), n.: pl. metapapapleræ (-râ). [NL., cf. Gr. μετά, with + ΝΑΪ, papapleron.] In entom., the papapleron of the metathoracic segment; the third sclerite of the metapleuron.

metapapais (met-a-pâ'pâ'sis), n. [NL., cf. Gr. μετά, beyond + πάσσω, a cooking (boiling), cf. πάσσω, cook, boil; see papais.] In (bot.), a term suggested by G. H. Kinahan, but not generally adopted, as a synonym for what is generally called regional metamorphism. See metamorphism.

One kind of Metamorphism is local, or extends over large areas. The rocks affected by it seem to have been under the influence of intensely heated water or steam, which, as it rose, drew them from which the action may be called metapapais.

G. H. Kinahan, Geol. of Ireland, p. 176.

metaph. An abbreviation of metaphysics.
metaphery (me-taf'e-ri), n. [(Gr. μεταφέρω, carry over, transfer; see metaphor. Cf. periphery.] In bot., the transposition or displacement of various floral organs, as when petals that are normally alternate with the sepals are placed in front of them, as rarely occurs in Fuchsia.

metaphor (met'ə-for), n. [= F. métaphore = Sp. metáfora = It. metafora, < L. metaphora < Gr. μεταφορά, a transfer to one word of the sense of another (L. translatio), < μεταφέρω carry over, transfer, < μετα, over, + φέρω, carry, = E. bear]. A figure of speech by which, from some supposed resemblance or analogy, a name, an attribute, or an action belonging to or characteristic of one object is assigned to another to which it is not literally applicable; the figurative transfer of a descriptive or affirmative word or phrase from one thing to another; implied comparison by transference of terms; as, the ship spread its wings to the breeze; "Judah is a lion's whelp," Gen. xlix. 9. If Jacob had said, "it is like or resembles a lion's whelp," the expression would have been a simile instead of a metaphor. A simple metaphor is contained in a single word or phrase, like those in italics above; a continued metaphor is one in which the figurative description or characterization is maintained throughout a variety of phrases or applications. See simile and trope.

What else is your Metaphor but an invasion of sense by transport; your allegory by a duplicate of meaning or dissimulation under count and dark intentions?
Patterson, Art of Eng. Poetic, p. 128

Whatever here seems beautiful, seem'd to be
But a faint Metaphor of Thee.
Cowley, The Mistress, Not Fair.

A metaphor is no argument, though it be sometimes the gunpowder to drive one home and imbue it in the memory.
Lowell, Democracy.

Mixed metaphor, a figurative expression in which two or more metaphors are confused, as in the following quotation:

Where still to use your lordship's tropes
The level of obedience slopes
Upward and downward, as the stream
Of hydra faction kicks the beam!
T. Moore, To Lord Castlereagh.

• Syn. Comparison, Allegory, etc. See simile.

metaphoric (met'ə-for'ik), a. [= F. métaphorique = Sp. metafórico = It. metaforico, < L. metaphoricus (in adv. metaphorice), < Gr. μεταφορικος, relating to metaphor, < μεταφορά, metaphor; see metaphor.] Same as metaphorical.

metaphorical (met'ə-for'ik-əl), a. [Gr. μεταφορικῶς + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metaphor; consisting of or abounding in metaphor; not literal; as, a metaphorical expression; a metaphorical use of words.

How dangerous it is in sensible things to use metaphorical expressions unto the people, and what aboundments they will swallow in their littles!
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 10.

metaphorically (met'ə-for'ik-əl-i), adv. In a metaphorical manner or sense; by way of metaphor; not literally.

metaphoricalness (met'ə-for'ik-əl-nēs), n. The state or quality of being metaphorical.

metaphorist (met'ə-for'ist), n. [Gr. μεταφοριστής + -ist.] One who coins or uses metaphors.

Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegories.
Mortimer Scribble-rus.

metaphosphate (met'ə-fos'fat), n. [Gr. μεταφωσφορικός + -ate.] A salt formed by the union of metaphosphoric acid with a base.

metaphosphoric (met'ə-fos-for'ik), a. [Gr. μεταφωσφορικός, with, + E. phosphoric.] Pertaining to, produced from, or resembling phosphorus or phosphoric acid. Metaphosphoric acid, HPO₃, an acid obtained by burning phosphorus under a bell glass filled with air or oxygen and absorbing the fumes in water, or by heating orthophosphoric acid to redness. When the water is evaporated, the acid is left as a soft, very deliquescent mass. The glassy phosphoric acid of commerce is metaphosphoric acid with soda as an impurity.

metaphragm (met'ə-fram), n. [Gr. μεταφράγμα, partition, < Gr. μετα, over, + φράγμα, fence, screen; see diaphragm.] In entom., the metapostscutellum, which is visible externally in some insects, but in others is internal, forming a transverse partition at the base of the abdomen.

metaphragma (met'ə-frag'ma), n.; pl. metaphragmata (-ma-tā). [N.L.] Same as metaphragm.

metaphrase (met'ə-frāz), n. [= F. métaphrase = Sp. metáfrasis = It. metafrasi, < L. metaphrasis, < Gr. μεταφράσις, a translation or paraphrase, < μετα, over, or change from one style to another, as from poetry to prose, < μετα, over, + φράσις, speak; see phrase. Cf. paraphrase, paraphrasis.] 1. A translation; specifically, a literal translation; a close version or translation from one language into another; opposed to paraphrase.

His metaphrase of the Psalms is still in our hands.
Sp. Hall, To Mr. S. Burton.

2. A responding phrase; a repartee.

I'm somewhat dull, still, in the manly art
Of phrase and metaphrase.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, vii.

metaphrase (met'ə-frāz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metaphrased, ppr. metaphrasing. [Gr. μεταφράσις, < μετα, over, + φράσις, speak; see phrase.] To translate literally; turn into exactly corresponding words; as, to metaphrase Latin poetry.

metaphrasis (me-tuf'ra-sis), n. [N.L.; see metaphrase.] Same as metaphrase.

Metaphrasis is to take some notable place out of a good Poet, and turn the same news into meter, or into other words in Promo.
Auchin, The Scholemaster, p. 93.

metaphrast (met'ə-frast), n. [= F. métaphraste = Sp. metáfrasty = It. metafrast, < Gr. μεταφράστης, one who changes from one style to another, < μεταφράσις, change from one style to another; see metaphrasis.] A person who translates literally from one language into another.

George Sandys, Esq., the famous traveler and excellent poetical metaphrast.
Wood, East Oxon., p. 126.

metaphrastic (met'ə-fras'tik), a. [Gr. μεταφραστικός + -ic.] Close or literal in translation.

Maximus Planudes, who has the merit of having familiarized to his countrymen many Latin classics of the lower empire, by metaphrastic versions.
Watson, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 160.

metaphrastical (met'ə-fras'ti-kal), a. [Gr. μεταφραστικός + -al.] Same as metaphrastic.

metaphysic (met'ə-fiz'ik), a. and n. [= F. métaphysique = Sp. metafísico = It. metafisico, < L. metaphysicus, < ML. metaphysicus, < Gr. μεταφυσικός, from the earlier noun metaphysica, neut. pl.; as a noun, formerly also metaphysique, < F. metaphysique = Sp. metafísico = It. metafisico, < L. metaphysicus, neut. pl. (later metaphysic, fem. pl.) as a noun, a transfer of the Greek title μεταφυσικά, A-N, 'the (books) after the Physics, 1-50,' applied first probably by Andronicus of Rhodes, in the 1st century B. C., to certain books of Aristotle, which were not intended to form one treatise, but which all relate to what he called πρώτη φιλοσοφία, first philosophy; μετα, after; φύσις, physics; see physic, physics. The preposition or prefix came to be regarded as meaning 'beyond,' 'above,' and the title metaphysica as the name of a science 'that is above or transcends physics.' Hence mod. formations like metachemistry, metalogic, metamathematics, etc.] 1. Same as metaphysical.

By any metaphysic book

S. Green, Cosmologia Sacra, iv. 8.

He knew what a what, and that's as high
As metaphysic will can fly.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. 1. 130.

II. n. Same as metaphysics.

The one part, which is physic, inquireth and handleth the material and efficient causes; and the other, which is metaphysic, handleth the formal and final causes.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

When I say metaphysic, you will be pleased to remember that all general reasoning, all politics, law, morality, and divinity, are merely metaphysic.
Horne Tooke, Diversions of Purley, II. iv.

The full treatment of the whole mass of empirical detail is impossible without a more thorough metaphysic.
Adams, Fichte, p. 222.

metaphysicist (met'ə-fiz'ik), v. t. [= F. métaphysiquer = It. metafisicare, discourse metaphysically; from the noun; see metaphysic, n.] To make metaphysical. Walpole, Letters (1782), IV. 300. (Darwin.)

metaphysical (met'ə-fiz'ik-əl), a. [Gr. μεταφυσικός + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to metaphysics or metaphysics; in a loose sense, philosophical; hence, highly abstract; apart from ordinary or practical modes of thought.

Hobbes had in language more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer, maintained that the will of the Prince was the standard of right and wrong.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., II.

2. Relating to real being, and not merely to appearance; transcendental; hence, pertaining to unverifiable hypotheses.

Both ideas and words may be said to be true in a metaphysical sense of the word "truth," . . . i. e., really to be such as they exist.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxvii. 2.

3. Pertaining to abstractions, or modes thought of as objects, and named as if they were things; abstract.

Truth and falsehood are odd kind of Metaphysical things to them, which they do not care to trouble their heads with.
Silliman, Sermons, II. 1.

4. Preternatural or supernatural.

The golden round,
Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seem
To have thee crown'd withal.

Shak., Macbeth, I. 5. 30.

Metaphysical abstraction. See abstraction. Metaphysical category, a category of real being; a concept of a form of existence. Metaphysical cognition. See practical cognition, under cognition. Metaphysical definition, a definition by genus and difference. Metaphysical hypothesis, in older writers, a supposition that something really exists, thus comprehending scientific hypotheses generally; by positivist writers used to denote an unverifiable hypothesis, a hypothesis concerning things in themselves as distinguished from phenomena. Metaphysical method. See method. Metaphysical mode of expression, the expression of a fact by means of abstract nouns, instead of concrete nouns and adjectives. Metaphysical partition, the mental separation of anything into parts whose separate existence is impossible. Metaphysical whole. (a) A species conceived as compounded of its genus and specific difference. (b) A whole of comprehension, or a logical term conceived as compounded of its predicates. (c) A whole of comprehension in a more general sense; a natural whole, any whole in which the subject is viewed as the whole of which the predicates are parts.

metaphysically (met'ə-fiz'ik-əl-i), adv. 1. From a metaphysical point of view; by metaphysical methods; as regards metaphysics. 2. Supernaturally.

The eclipse of the sunne that darkened all the earth at Christes passion, happening altogether prodigiously and metaphysically in plenitude.
G. Hervey, Letter to Ed. Spenser (1580).

metaphysician (met'ə-fiz'ish-ən), n. [= F. métaphysicien; < metaphysic + -ian.] 1. One who is versed in the science of metaphysics. 2. One who practises the mind-cure. [Recent and vulgar.]

metaphysicist (met'ə-fiz'is-ist), n. [Gr. μεταφυσικός + -ist.] Same as metaphysician.

metaphysics (met'ə-fiz'iks), n. [Pl. of metaphysic; see -ics.] 1. The science of the inward and essential nature of things. (a) As the subject of the books of Aristotle so-called first philosophy; ontology, the analysis of the nature of being in general; the doctrine of first principles. (b) The prefix meta, being understood as meaning 'beyond,' 'supernatural science,' the doctrine of that which transcends all human experience. (c) The science of the mind treated by means of introspection and analysis, and not by experiment and scientific observation; rational psychology. (d) Any doctrine based upon presumption and not upon inductive reasoning and observation. (e) An abstract, untrustworthy body of doctrine supposed to be virtually taken over from some science; as, 'the metaphysics of geometry.' [Used frequently with the definite article, and generally connected with unpleasant associations, as being a study very dry and at the same time of doubtful truth.

The mathematics and the metaphysics.

Fall to them as you find your stomach serves you.

Shak., T. of the S., I. 1. 37.

"How," she cried, "you love
The metaphysics!"
Tennyson, Princess, III.)

2. Philosophy in general; especially, the philosophical study of mind; psychology; so used from the time of Descartes, and especially by the Scotch school.

Metaphysics was a word formerly appropriated to the ontology and pneumatology of the schools, but now understood as equally applicable to all those inquiries which have for their object to trace the various branches of human knowledge to their first principles in the human mind.
D. Stewart, Dissertation, p. 475.

3. In the Kantian terminology, the science of God, freedom, and immortality.

Abbreviated metaph.

metaphysiological (met'ə-fiz'io-lōj'ik-əl), a. [Gr. μεταφυσικός, beyond, + φύσις, nature, physiology, + -ic.] Beyond the province of physiology.

metaphysis (me-tuf'is-sis), n. [Gr. μετὰ φύσιν, nature; see physic.] Change of nature; transformation; metamorphosis.

metaplasia (met'ə-plā'si-ā), n. [N.L.; < Gr. μεταπλασία, transformation; see metaplasia.] The conversion of an adult tissue directly into another form of adult tissue, as of hyaline cartilage into mucous tissue. This takes place principally, if not exclusively, among the tissues of the connective-tissue group.

metaplasis (me-tap'la-sis), n. [N.L.; < Gr. μεταπλασις, transformation, < μετὰ, over, + πλασις, molding, conformation, < πλασσω, form, mold. Cf. metaplasia.] See the quotation.

This eminent philosopher regarded the ontogeny of an individual to be divisible into three periods: first, the stages of Anaplasia, or those of progressive evolution; second, the stages of fulfilled growth and development, Metaplasia; third, those of decline, Ataplasia.
Amer. Nat., XXII. 331.

metaplasia (met'ə-plāz-i-ā), n. [L. metaplasia, < Gr. μεταπλασία, a transformation, the assumption of a present or nominative for the derived tenses of verbs or cases of nouns, < μετα, over, + πλασσω, transform, change, < μετὰ, over, + πλασις, form, mold.] In gram.: (a) A change or transmutation in a word by adding, transposing, or retrenching a syllable or letter.

Intercalaries (but it is possible that this letter is simply a metaplasia for intercalaris). Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 30.

(3) Formation of an oblique case or cases from a stem other than that of the nominative.

metaplast (met'-a-plast), n. [Gr. μετά, over, + πλαστός, something molded; see plast.] In bot., protoplasm containing certain carbohydrates which are eventually separated from it in the formation of cell-walls or as secretions.

The metaplast of Hanstein, i. e. that part of the protoplasm which holds the formative material, is colored at most scarlet by Hanstein's aniline violet.

Poulson, Bot. Micro Chem. (trans.), p. 82.

metaplast (met'-a-plast), n. [Gr. μετά, over, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλαστός, form, mold. Cf. metaplast.] In gram., a word or the stem of a word exhibiting metaplast.

metaplastic (met'-a-plas'tik), a. [metaplast + -ic.] Pertaining to, exhibiting, or characterized by metaplast.

metaplastology (met'-a-plas-tol'-ō-jī), n. [*Gr. μετά, over, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλαστός, form, + Gr. -λογία, cf. επιστήμη, see -ology.*] The doctrine or science of metaplast.

Haeckel used also the term Anaplastology for the physiological relations of the stages of progressive growth and those of the Epasme of groups, Metaplastology for those of the adult and the Acme of groups, and Anaplastology for those of the adult stages and the Acme of groups.

Amer. Nat., XXII, 882.

metapleur (met'-a-plūr), n. [Gr. μετά, behind, + πλευρά, the side.] A posterior part or extent of the lateral epipleura or epipleural fold of Amphioxus, behind the preoral epipleura; the atrial epipleura, corresponding in extent to the atrial cavity. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 184.

metapleural (met'-a-plō'ral), a. [metapleura + -al.] 1. In entom., posterior and lateral, as a portion of a metathoracic segment; of or pertaining to the metapleuron. — 2. Of or pertaining to the metapleuron.

metapleuron (met'-a-plō'ron), n.; pl. metapleura (-rā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, with, + πλευρά, a rib.] In entom., the lateral or pleural division of the metathorax; a metathoracic pleuron of an insect. Each metapleuron, right and left, is divided into three sclerites: an episternum, an epimeron, and a parapleuron.

metapneustic (met'-a-pnūs'tik), a. [*Gr. μετά, behind, + πνεύσας, of or for breathing. cf. *πνεύμα, breathe; see pneumonic.] In entom., having a single pair of spiracles or breathing-orifices, situated at the anal end of the body, as certain larvae.

metapodia, n. Plural of metapodium.

metapodial (met'-a-pō'di-al), a. and n. [NL., metapodia; see metapodia.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the metapodia. — 2. Of or pertaining to the metapodium of a mollusk.

II. n. One of the metapodia; a metacarpal or metatarsal bone.

metapodialia (met'-a-pō-di-ā'li-ā), n. pl. [*NL. (Marsh, 1880), neut. pl. of metapodia, cf. metapodia, *q. v.] The bones of the metacarpus and metatarsus, taken together, and collectively considered as a segment of the fore or hind limb intervening between the mesopodia and the phalanges. See epipodialia.

metapodium (met'-a-pō'di-um), n.; pl. metapodia (-ā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + πούς (pod-) = *E. foot.] The posterior one of the three sections into which the foot of some mollusks, as gastropods and pteropods, may be divided; correlated with mesopodium and propodium.

metapolitics (met'-a-pol'i-tiks), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + πολιτικά, politics; see politics.] A purely speculative treatment of politics unrelated to practical questions. Coleridge.

Metapontine (met'-a-pont'in), a. and n. [*L. Metapontinus, cf. Metapontum, cf. Μεταπόντιος, a city in Italy (see def.), orig. neut. of μεταπόντιος, in the midst of the sea. *Gr. μετά, amid, + πόντος, sea.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Metapontum or Metapontium, an ancient city of Magna Graecia in Italy.

Every Athenian coin displays the owl, . . . every Metapontian the corn-ear, as its chief device.

The Academy, Feb. 2, 1888, p. 120.

II. n. An inhabitant of Metapontum.

metapophysis (met'-a-pō-fiz'i-sis), a. [metapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a metapophysis.

metapophysis (met'-a-pō-fiz'i-sis), n. [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, after, + ἀπόφυσις, a process; see apophysis.] In anat., a dorsolateral apophysis developed on the prozygapophysis or anterior articular process of a vertebra, especially in the lumbar region. It corresponds to the transverse process of a thoracic vertebra. It is sometimes very highly developed, as in the armadillo, when it assists in the support of the carapace. In man, in whom it is rudimentary yet is endogenous or enveloped from an independent center of ossification, it is found in the lumbar region, as the mamillary process or mamillary tubercle. See cut under lumbar.

metapore (met'-a-pōr), n. [*NL., metaporus, cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + πόρος, passage; see pore.] A small blind pore in the median line of the medulla oblongata immediately behind the pons Varolii; the so-called foramen of Magendie.

metapostscutellar (met'-a-pōst-sku'tel-ār), a. [metapostscutellum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapostscutellum.

metapostscutellum (met'-a-pōst-sku'tel'um), n.; pl. metapostscutella (-ā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. postscutellum, *q. v.] The postscutellum of the metanotum; the postscutellar sclerite of the metathorax of an insect.

metapreacutal (met'-a-prē-sku'tal), a. [metapreacutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapreacutum.

metapreacutum (met'-a-prē-sku'tum), n.; pl. metapreacuta (-tā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. preacutum, *q. v.] In entom., the preacutum of the metanotum; the preacutal sclerite of the metathorax.

metapsyche (met'-a-psī'ke), n. [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + ψυχή, soul; see Psyche.] Haeckel's name for the hind-brain or cerebellar segment of the encephalon; the metencephalon or open-cephalon.

metapsychosis (me-tap-sī-kō'sis), n.; pl. metapsychoses (-ōsēs). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, a transfer, of soul from one body to another, cf. *μετα, over, + ψυχή, a giving of life or spirit; see psychosis.] The supposed action of one mind upon another without any known physical means of communication, or its effect. See psychosis and telepathy.

It would be a grave retardation of science were it assumed that this strange metapsychosis was a medical entity alone.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III, 422.

metapterygial (me-tap-te-rij'i-al), a. [metapterygium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapterygium; as, metapterygial basalis.

metapterygium (me-tap-te-rij'i-um), n.; pl. metapterygia (-iā). [*NL. (Huxley, 1871), cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. pterygium, *q. v.] The hindmost of several basal cartilages which the pterygium of a fish, as an elasmobranch, may present. See pterygium.

metapterygoid (met'-a-ter'i-goid), a. and n. [Gr. μετά, after, + E. pterygoid.] 1. a. Coming after or situated behind the true pterygoid.

II. n. A metapterygoid bone.

metaptosis (met'-a-ptō'sis), n. [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, a change, cf. μεταστροφή, change, cf. *μετα, over, + πτίνω, fall, cf. πτύσις, a falling.] In logic, the change of a proposition from being false to being true, or the reverse.

metarabin (me-tar-'ā-bin), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. arabin.] The gum of cherry-plum, and almond-trees. Its chemical relations are not yet determined.

metargon (met'-ar-gon), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + argon.] An elementary substance obtained, in a gaseous form, by the volatilization of the white solid which remains after liquid argon has boiled away.

Metarrhipha (met'-a-rip'hā), n. pl. [*NL., cf. *Gr. μεταρριπτή, turn over, turn about, cf. *μετα, over, + ρίπτω, throw.] An order of accephalous or conchiferous mollusks founded upon the family Tridacnidae. In these gigantic bivalves the body is apparently turned half-way round, whence the name. There is a subventral adductor muscle, and the foot protrudes in front of the beak or umbo of the shell. Gill.

metarrhiphous (met'-a-rip'hūs), a. Of or pertaining to the Metarrhipha, or having their characteristics.

metascuta, n. Plural of metascutum.

metascutal (met'-a-sku'tal), a. [metascutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metascutum.

metascutellar (met'-a-sku'tel-ār), a. [metascutellum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metascutellum.

metascutellum (met'-a-sku'tel'um), n.; pl. metascutella (-ā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, beyond, + NL. scutellum, *q. v.] In entom., the scutellum of the metanotum; the scutellar sclerite of the metathorax.

metascutum (met'-a-sku'tum), n.; pl. metascuta (-tā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, beyond, + NL. scutum, *q. v.] In entom., the scutum or second division of the metanotum. The name is principally used in descriptions of Hymenoptera, Diptera, and Neuroptera, in which the metascutum generally forms an oblique or vertical surface behind the wings and above the insertion of the abdomen.

metasilicate (met'-a-sil'i-kāt), n. [metasilic + -ate.] A salt of the hypothetical metasilicic acid H_2SiO_3 ; often called in mineralogy a bisilicate; as, calcium metasilicate (the mineral wollastonite, $CaSiO_3$ or $CaO.SiO_2$).

metasilicic (met'-a-sil'i-sik), a. [Gr. μετά, with, + E. silicic.] A word used only in the phrase metasilicic acid. See metasilicic.

metasoma (met'-a-sō'mā), n.; pl. metasomata (-mā-tā). [NL.; see metasome.] Same as metasome.

metasomatic (met'-a-sō-mat'ik), a. [metasoma (-sō-mat-) + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the metasome of a cephalopod. — 2. Pertaining to or resulting from metasomatism; as, metasomatic rocks.

metasomatism (met'-a-sō'mat-izm), n. [As metasomat(-ism) + -ism.] Same as metasomatosis.

metasomatosis (met'-a-sō-matō'sis), n. [*L., cf. *Gr. μετά, over, + σωμα (sōma), body.] In lithol., a term used by a few writers on chemical geology with various shades of meaning, but chiefly in propounding certain theories of the transformation of one rock into another of a very different kind (as of limestone into granite), changes recognized as possible by but few geologists. See metamorphism.

Although the crystalline rocks . . . have been supposed to be occasionally the subject of wide-spread metasomatosis, we may properly restrict the title of a general metasomatic hypothesis to that which seeks to explain the derivation of the principal crystalline silicated rocks from limestones.

T. S. Hunt, Min. Petrology and Petrography, p. 106.

metasome (met'-a-sōm), n. [*NL. metasoma, cf. *Gr. μετά, after, + σωμα, body.] The posterior part of the body of a cephalopod, which is enveloped in the mantle and contains the viscera. The name is also given to the posterior part of the body of bivalve mollusks, behind the mesosome and the foot, containing the posterior adductor muscle.

metastannate (met'-a-stan'tat), n. [metastannic + -ate.] A salt of metastannic acid.

metastannic (met'-a-stan'tik), a. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. stannic.] An epithet applied to the hydrate or acid produced by digesting tin in nitric acid. It is isomeric with stannic acid, but quite different in its properties.

metastasis (me-tas'tā-sis), n. [*NL., cf. *Gr. μεταστροφή, a removal, change, departure, cf. μεταστροφή, put in another place, change, remove, cf. *μετα, over, + στροφή, place; see stasis.] 1. Change of substance; conversion of one substance into another.

He considers what not unfrequently happens in diseased bodies by the metastasis of the morbid matter.

Boyle, Works, II, 107.

2. In pathol., the production of local disease in some part of the body from a focus of more or less similar disease in some other part not immediately adjacent. — 3. In bot., metabolism.

metastatic (met'-a-stat'ik), a. [metastasis (-at-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metastasis; characterized by or consisting in metastasis.

Those metastatic changes which take place in the ordinary growth of plants or the storing of reserve material.

Beesey, Botany, p. 180.

metastatically (met'-a-stat'ik-ly), adv. By metastasis.

metasternal (met'-a-stēr-nal), a. [metasternum + -al.] In entom., metathoracic and sternul or ventral, as a sclerite of an insect's thorax; of or pertaining to the metasternum. — Metasternal epimeron and episterna, the side pieces of the metathorax, adjoining the sternum. — Metasternal pores, minute openings at the sides of the metasternum, found in certain beetles of the family Cerambycidae. They exhale a musky odor produced by scent organs within the body. Also called metapores.

metasternum (met'-a-stēr-num), n.; pl. metasterna (-nā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, behind, + στέρνον, breast.] 1. In anat., the hindmost segment or last sternite of the breast-bone; the xiphisternum, in man represented by the xiphoid cartilage or ensiform appendage. — 2. In entom., the sternite of the metathorax; the median part of the postpectum.

metasthenic (met'-a-sthē-nik), a. [Gr. μετά, behind, + σθένος, strength, might.] Strong in the hinder parts; having the strength or weight of organization behind the middle of the body, as a kangaroo.

metastibnite (met'-a-stīb'nit), n. [Gr. μετά, along with, + E. stibnite.] Antimony trisulphid, occurring as an amorphous reddish coating upon siliceous stifer at the Steamboat Springs, Washoe county, Nevada.

metastoma (me-tas'tō-mā), n.; pl. metastomata (met'-a-stō-mā-tā). [*NL., cf. *Gr. μετά, behind,

First spirit shows we both measure, that as to say howe any thinge that has height may be just howe high it is,
and this may be done in many maners.

H.S. Jones, 112. (Hollisell.)

She [the soul] counts their stars, she mete their distances
And differing pace.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 6.

A fair dial to mete out the day.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, l. 2.

2. To distribute or apportion by measure; measure or deal (out); dole.

I will divide Shushem, and mete out the valley of Succoth.

Pa. ix. 6.

For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again.

Luke vi. 38.

I mete and dole

Unequal laws unto a savage race.

Tennyson, Ulysses.

3. To be a measure of; serve for determining or expressing the extent, quantity, or capacity of.

What word metes absolute loss?

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

II. intrans. To take measure or line; aim.

Let the mark have a prick in 't to mete at.

meto¹ (mēt), n. [(a) < ME. mete (mēte) (not found in AS., where the expected form mēte* is represented by the related mēth, f.) (= OFries. mete, meta = MD. maet, D. maat = MHG. māze, G. maaz, f., also MHG. māz, G. mass, n.), measure; suited in E. with
(b) the related form, now dial., met, < ME. met, mette, < AS. gemet, measure (= OS. gemet, measure, = Icel. met, pl., weights of scales); < metan, measure, mete: see metel, r.] 1. Measure.

(Give thou trowe weyghte, mete, & measure,

And then shall grace with the Indure

Book of Pseodance (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), l. 68.

¶ XI. foote of mette

Iche eline away from oth'r must be borne.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 68.

2. Computation; estimate; measure.

To take thy neighbors catel [property] agayn his wyl, be it by force or by sleighte, be it by mete (var. mette) or by measure.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

3. Limitation; limit: in the phrase metes and bounds (rarely in the singular met and bound).

The aggrieved party stood on his right and demanded that the frontier should be set out by metes and bounds.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xviii.

The Eternal order circles round,

And wave and storm find mete and bound

In Providence. Whittier, Anniversary Poem.

meto², r. [ME. meten (pret. mette), < AS. mētan, dream.] I. intrans. 1. To dream: often used impersonally: as, me mette, I dreamed.

And in a launde as ich lay, Ienede ich and slepte,
And mercuriously me mette. Piers Plowman (C) l. 9.

This nyght threwe

To goode mete it turne. of yow I mette.

Chaucer, Troilus II. 30.

Hence — 2. To lose the use of one's senses; be out of one's mind.

I swor hir this

Never to false yow, but (unless) I mette.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 1234.

II. trans. To dream.

Thanne gan I to meten a merveillouse awene [dream]

Piers Plowman (B), ProL. l. 11.

meto³, r. l. [ME. meten, metten, < AS. mētan, paint.] To paint.

meto⁴, r. An obsolete form of metel.

meto⁵, a. An obsolete form of metel.

metogavel, n. [ME. metr, food, + gavel, a tax.] A tribute, charge, or rent paid in virtu-als.

metelt, n. [ME., also meteltes; < meten, dream;
see *metel*².] A dream.

And Ioseph mette metels ful meruillous alse.

How the sunne and the mone and euene steres

Falden bi-fore his feet and helieden him alle.

Piers Plowman (A), viii. 145.

metoleast, a. A Middle English form of metel-less.

metely, a. See metely.

metembryo (me-tem-'bri-ō), n. [Gr. metá, after, + embryon, embryo; see embryo.] The gastrula stage of the metazoan embryo, parallel with the adult of some sponges, as ascous.
Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887. See out under gastrula.

metembryonic (me-tem-'bri-on'ik), a. [Gr. metá, after, + embryon, embryo; see embryo.] Of or pertaining to a metembryo.

metempiric (met-em-'pí-rik), n. [Gr. metá, beyond, + teupia, experience; see empiric.] One who believes in the metempirical or transcendental philosophy. Also metempiricist.

metempirical (met-em-'pí-rik), a. [Gr. metá, beyond, + teupia, experience; see empiric.] Beyond or outside of experience; not based on experience; transcendental; a priori: opposed to empirical or experiential.

The metempirical region is the void where speculation remains unchecked, where sense has no footing, where Experiment can exercise no control, and where calculation ends in impossible quantities.

G. H. Lewis, Probs. of Life and Mind, l. 1. § 18.

metempiricism (met-em-'pí-'i-sizm), n. [Gr. metá, beyond, + teupia, experience; see empiric.] In metaph., a system of philosophy based on a priori reasoning; transcendentalism.

metempiricist (met-em-'pí-'i-sist), n. [Gr. metá, beyond, + teupia, experience; see empiric.] Same as metempiric.

metempsychosis (me-tem-'pí-'síz), r. l.; pret.
and pp. metempsychosed, ppr. metempsychosing.
[Gr. metempsychosis.] To transfer from one body to another, as the soul; cause to undergo me-tempsychosis.

The souls of usurers after their death Lucian affirms to be metempsychosed, or translated into the bodies of asses, and there remain certain years for poor men to take their pennyworth out of their bones.

Peascham, Blazoning metempsychosis (me-tem-'pí-'síz), n. [Gr. metempsychosis (rare), < Gr. metempsychosis, the transference of the soul from one body into another, < metempsychon, make the soul pass from one body into another, < metem, over, + psychon, put a soul into, animate, < psyche, having life, < psu, in, + psyche, soul, life; see Psyche, and cf.

psychosis, metempsychosis.] Transmigration of the soul; the passing of the soul of a person after death into another body, either that of a human being or that of an animal: a doctrine held by various ancient peoples and by Py-thagoras and his followers, and still maintained by Brahmins and some others; also loosely used of such a transfer of the soul of a living person.

I cannot believe the wisdom of Pythagoras did ever positively, and in a literal sense, affirm his metempsychosis, or impossible transmigration of the souls of men into beasts.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 37.

The Mollah and the Christian dog

Change place in mad metempsychosis.

Whittier, The Hunchback.

metempsychosize (me-tem-'pí-'síz), r. l.; pret.
and pp. metempsychosized, ppr. metempsychosizing.
[Gr. metempsychosis + -ize.] To cause to pass after death into the body of some other living thing; send of the soul.

Isaac Walton . . . metempsychosized into a frog.

Sandley, Doctor, cell. (Davies.)

metempsychosis (me-tem-'pí-'síz), r. l.; pret.
and pp. metempsychosized, ppr. metempsychosizing.
[Gr. metempsychosis + -ize.] To cause
to pass after death into the body of some other living thing; send of the soul.

metencephalic (met-en-se-'fal'ik or -sál'ik),
a. [Gr. metencephalon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metencephalon, in either sense.

metencephalon (met-en-se-'fal'ion), n. [Gr. metencephalon (rare), < Gr. metencephalon, after, + encephalon, the brain; see encephalon.] 1. The forebrain; the medulla oblongata as far as the pons Varolii; synonymous with myelencephalon of Huxley and others, and metencephalon of Owen.
Quinn; Wilder and Gage. — 2. The cerebellar segment of the brain, the chief parts of which are the cerebellum and pons Varolii. Huxley.
See ents under brain and encephalon.

metensomatosis (me-en-so-ma-'tíz), n. [Gr. metensomatosis, a putting into another body, < metensoma, put into another body, < metem, over, + soma, body, < embryo, put into a body, embody, < embu, in the body, < em, in, + bua, body.] The transference of the elements of one body into another body and their conversion into its substance, as by decomposition and assimilation.

Is it not indisputable that man's body . . . is composed of the very same materials, the same protein, and fat, and salts, and water, which constitute the inorganic world — which may unquestionably have served long ago as the dead material which was vivified and utilized in the bodies of extinct creatures, and which may serve in endless metensomatosis (if the word, which has the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, and which is now imperiously demanded by the wants of science, may be pardoned on the score of necessity) for we know not what organisms yet to come?

Perrin.

metenteron (met-en-'te-ron), n.; pl. metentera (-rā). [NL., < Gr. metá, after, + enteron, intestine; see enteron.] The enteron, in any sec-

dary, differentiated, or specialized state occurring from modification of its primary condition of archenteron.

metenteronic (met-en-'te-ron'ik), a. [Gr. metenteron + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metenteron.

meteogram (mē-'tē-'ō-gram), n. [Short for "me-teorogram," < Gr. meteo, a meteor (see meteor), + gramma, a writing; see gram.] A diagram composed of the tracings made by several self-recording meteorological instruments, as the thermograph and the barograph.

meteograph (mē-'tē-'ō-gráf), n. [Short for me-teorograph.] Same as meteorograph.

The meteograph, with the anemograph.

R. Abercromby, Nature, XXXVI. 310.

meteor (mē-'tē-'ōr), n. [Gr. meteora, F. mété-ore = Sp. Pg. meteoro = It. meteora, < NL. meteorum, < Gr. meteo, a meteor (def. 1), usually in pl. meteora, lit. 'things in the air,' neut. of meteo, lifted up, on high, in 'air, < metá, beyond, + aipein, lift up, raise (> aipein, another form of aipein, a being lifted up or suspended on high, hovering, anything suspended.)] 1.
Any atmospheric phenomenon.

Hail, an ordinary meteor; murrain of cattle an ordinary disease, yet for a plague to obscured Pharaoh miraculously wrought.

Sp. Hall, Invisible World, l. 1. 6.

Except they be watered from higher regions, and fructifying meteors of knowledge, these weeds must so lose their alimental sappe, and wither of themselves.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., Pref.

In starry flags, and pellicle.

All day the hoary meteor fell.

Whittier, Snow-Bound.

Specifically — 2. A transient fiery or luminous body seen in or through the atmosphere, usually in its more elevated region; a shooting-star. If it reaches the surface of the earth, it is called a meteorite, formerly aerolite, and also (very rarely) uranolite.

And all their silver crescents than I saw

Like falling meteors spout, and set for ever

Under the cross of Malta.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, II. 1.

The imperial ensign, which, full high advanced,

Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind.

Milton, P. L., l. 437.

3. A small body moving in space, and of the same nature as those which become visible by encountering our atmosphere. There is reason to suppose that such bodies are very numerous, and that a large proportion of them are concentrated in swarms. It is considered very probable that a comet is only such a meteoric swarm.

meteor. An abbreviation of meteorology, meteorological.

meteor-cloud (mē-'tē-'ōr-'kloud), n. 1. A flock of small meteoroids moving in space. Also called meteoric swarm. 2. A cloud-like train left by a meteor in the upper air. [Rare.]

meteor-dust (mē-'tē-'ōr-'dust), n. Matter in infinitesimal particles supposed to be floating throughout free space, and gradually settling upon the surfaces of the heavenly bodies.

Sir W. Thomson . . . shows that meteor dust, accumulating at the rate of one foot in 4,000 years, would account for the remainder of retardation.

Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 248.

meteoric (mē-'tē-'ōr'ik), a. [= F. météorique = Sp. meteorico = Pg. It. meteorico, < NL. meteoric, pertaining to meteors, ML. in the air, on high, < NL. meteorum, a meteor; see meteor.] 1.
Of the upper air; ethereal; empirical.

The fiery particles ascended to the most meteoric or highest regions. Sharon Turner, Sacred Hist. of World
(tr. of Bled. scholia), p. 24.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of a meteor; consisting of meteors; as, meteoric stones; meteoric showers.

Our nature is meteoric we respect because we partake in both earth and heaven.

Bacon, Letters, xxvii.

3. Flashing like a meteor; transiently or irregularly brilliant.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (grandson of the first earl, the famous meteoric politician of the reign of Charles II.), was born in 1671 and died in 1713.

Craig, Hist. Eng. Lit., II. 235.

Meteoric astronomy, that branch of science which treats of meteors and meteoroids in their astronomical relations. Meteoric iron. See iron and meteoric. Meteoric ring, a swarm of meteoroids more or less thickly scattered along the entire orbit to which they circulate about the sun or other central body, so as to form a ring around it. The rings of saturn are probably thus constituted. Meteoric showers, showers of meteors or shooting-stars occurring periodically, and especially in the months of August and November. The maximum brilliancy occurs every thirty-three years, and then sometimes for four years in succession there are showers of unusual magnitude. They are now known to be connected with comets. — Meteoric stones, aerolites. See meteorite.

Meteoric swarm. Same as meteor-cloud.—Meteoric waters, waters which accrue from condensation of the vapors suspended in the atmosphere. Thomas, Mod. Diet.
meteoroid (mē'tē-ō-īd), n. [Gr. meteoros + -oid.] Same as meteorite. [Rare.]

[See a resemblance of that meteoric light which appears in incandescent places that seem fire, but is nothing but a filmy glittering exhalation. Sp. Hall, Soliloquies, vii.]

Meteorinae (mē'tē-ō-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL. Meteorus + -inae.] A subfamily of Brachyura or Ascheia ichneumon-flies, typified by the genus Meteoros, mainly parasitic on lepidopterous insects, having the abdomen petiolate and the fore wings with three submarginal cells.

meteorism (mē'tē-ō-riz-m), n. [= F. meteorisme.] = Sp. Ig. It. meteorismo, < NL. meteorismus, < Gr. meteoros, a being raised up, swelling, < metropo, raise up, < metropo, raised up; see metropo.] In pathol., flatulent distention of the abdomen; tympanitis.

meteorite (mē'tē-ō-rīt), n. [Gr. meteor + -ite.] A mineral or metallic mass of extraterrestrial origin, or which, to use the common expression, has "fallen from the heavens." Bodies of this kind were formerly often called aerolites, but meteorite is now their generally accepted name among scientific men. The fall of meteorites upon the earth is a by no means infrequent occurrence, and records of such events date back to many centuries before the present era. Traditions point to the very early use of meteoric iron for the manufacture of weapons, and it is also known that meteorites were not infrequently the objects of worship in various parts of the world. In spite of this, the fall of rocks or metals from the heavens seemed to be so improbable an event that full credence was not given by scientific men to stories of such occurrences until about the beginning of the present century, when several falls having taken place (at Barbotan, France, 1790; Senna, 1794; Wold Cottage, Yorkshire, Eng., 1795; Sals, France, 1798; Henares, 1798; L'Aigle, France, 1803), the details of some of which were thoroughly investigated, a further denial of their genuineness became impossible. From the time of the fall at L'Aigle all doubt in the matter was abandoned. There are now several collections of meteorites, each of which contains specimens of between 200 and 400 different falls, and the whole number known is not far from 400, although it is by no means the case with all these occurrences that the specimens were seen to fall, many of them have been found on the earth's surface but have been recognized as being extraterrestrial by their peculiar appearance and composition. The most important facts with regard to meteorites may be concisely stated as follows: They have not been found to contain any element not known to occur on the earth; they have furnished no evidence of the existence of life on the body or bodies of which they originally formed a part; they bear no indications of having been formed in the presence of water, or of the existence of water beyond the earth's atmosphere in the regions from which they came; they do exhibit abundant evidence of having had what geologists would call an "igneous origin"; they are never granitic in character, but resemble very closely certain volcanic rocks of not infrequent occurrence with this difference, that in the case of the meteorites the iron is associated with the siliceous combinations exists in the metallic form, while in the terrestrial volcanic rocks it is, with rare exceptions, oxidized. Furthermore, meteorites, almost without exception, show a certain family resemblance, so that it is necessary to admit, either that they all originally formed a part of one celestial body, or else that, having come from various members of the solar system, or from other systems, these have a wonderful resemblance to each other and to the earth itself. The most obvious division of meteorites is into metallic and stony, but the passage from one class to the other is by no means abrupt one. All metallic meteorites agree in that the predominating metal is iron, with which nickel is almost invariably associated, indeed, it has not been proved that there is any meteoric iron entirely free from that metal. With the nickel cobalt is almost always found, as is the case in terrestrial combinations. Tin and copper are also frequently found in meteorites in small quantity. The precious metals have not been detected in them. Meteorites composed almost entirely of metallic (oh keltious) iron, containing a nearly homogeneous mass, have been designated siderites. These, however, almost always contain irregular nodular masses of pyrrhotite, schreibersite (phosphure of iron and nickel, either one or both, and occasionally of graphite). In a large proportion of the meteoric stones, defining the polished surface with an acid develops the so-called "Widmanstätten figures." The development of these figures on the polished surface of a mass of iron found upon the earth's surface, and in regard to the time of whose fall nothing was known, was formerly considered to be sufficient evidence of the celestial origin of such a mass, especially if, in addition, the presence of nickel could be shown by chemical analysis. While most of the metallic masses thus referred have almost certainly been correctly classed among the meteorites, there may be cases in which such reference has not been justifiable, since it is now known that all celestial irons do not give the Widmanstätten figures, while the iron found in large quantity and over a wide area, associated with and embedded in basalt, near Oriskany in Greenland, contains nickel, and gives, when etched, figures which have generally been considered as Widmanstätten, although others have denied that they could properly be so designated. The terrestrial origin of the Oriskany iron is, however, now generally admitted, although for a considerable time after its discovery this was not the case. The wide extent of the area over which this iron occurs, and its peculiarly intimate association with the minerals of which the basalt is made up, forbid the idea that the metal could have fallen from above into lava in process of eruption which was at first the favorite theory of its origin. Next in order to the siderites come the pallasites, so named from the fact that a large meteorite of this class was in 1772 discovered in Siberia by the distinguished traveler Pallas. Under the name pallasites are comprehended those meteorites which consist of a spongy or vesicular mass of iron, the cavities of which are in most cases partly or entirely filled with olivine, with which various other minerals are frequently associated, enstatite and bronzite being the most common, while chromite is of not infrequent occurrence. Both siderites and pallasites belong to the class of metallic meteorites. By far the larger part of the stony meteorites are included under the designation of chondrites. In these the iron is distributed in fine particles through a more or less intimate mixture of silicates, with which chromite and magnetic pyrites are frequently associated, the silicates being chiefly olivine and bronzite. The name chondrite has reference to the fact that in this class of meteorites the material of which they are composed occurs in the form of rounded grains (chondrit). The chondritic meteorites have, however, a quite varied structure, in some cases passing into breccia; they have been divided into numerous subgroups in accordance with these structural variations. Most of the stony meteorites contain iron disseminated through their mass in nodules or globules, but there are a few which are destitute of such metallic particles. There are also a few stony meteorites which do not exhibit any traces of a chondritic structure, the minerals of which these are made up do not, however, differ very essentially from those occurring in the chondrites. There are also a few very monotonous meteorites which contain carbonaceous matter associated with the stony chondritic material. This carbon is not graphitic, but is combined with hydrogen and oxygen, the product resembling to a certain extent that resulting from the decay of organic matter, but no traces of vegetable tissue have been discovered in these carbonaceous meteorites, which are only five or six in number. One or two interesting facts remain to be mentioned. The first is that since the phenomena of meteorites began to be observed and studied there have been extremely few falls of metallic meteorites. Of all the meteoric iron in the various collections, those of Hraschina in Austria (1751), of Bickes, a county Tennessee (1855), of Braunau in Bohemia (1851), and a few others (in all probably about nine) are the only ones positively known to have fallen; all the others are considered meteoric on account of their peculiar appearance and chemical composition. The observed falls of stony meteorites, on the other hand, are numerous. Another remarkable fact is that all the meteorites which are known to have fallen are of infinitesimally small size, as compared with the earth. In the fall of L'Aigle some 2000 to 3000 stones were estimated to have reached the earth, and of these the largest weighed only seven or eight pounds. The largest meteorites of which the fall was observed are that of Ensisheim (1795), which weighed about 260 pounds, that of Juvénas (1811), 242 pounds, and that of Hammel county, Iowa (1879), when a considerable number of stones fell, the largest of them weighing 14 pounds. Some masses of iron believed to be meteoric, the date of whose fall is unknown, are much larger than this, but still utterly insignificant in size, not only as compared with the earth or its satellite, but even with the smallest celestial body of which anything is definitely known, namely the outer satellite of Mars, which has been estimated at from five to twenty miles in diameter. The mass of iron on the river Bengel in Brazil has been variously estimated at from seven to ten tons in weight, that of the Uran (Campa del Chelo) is said to weigh fifteen tons. The Santa Caterina from appears to be still larger, having been estimated at twenty-five tons, but doubts have been expressed as to whether this is really of celestial origin. Neumann's lines, structural lines described by J. G. Neumann as occurring in the Braum meteorite.

Meteoric Stone.

meteoritic (mē'tē-ō-rīt-ik), a. [Gr. meteor + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a meteorite or to meteorites.

The bright lines from the interspaces, now at their minimum and containing vapors of a very high temperature, balance the absorption of the meteoric nuclei. Nature, XXXVIII, 24.

meteorizer (mē'tē-ō-rī-zēr), v. [Gr. meteor + -ize.] To take the form of a meteor; ascend in vapors.

To the end the dew may meteorize and emit their finer spirits. Enchiridion, p. 10.

meteorograph (mē'tē-ō-rō-grāf), n. [= F. météorographe.] = Sp. meteorógrafo, < Gr. meteoros, a meteor, + graphein, write.] An instrument that combines the registering apparatus of a barograph, thermograph, anemograph, etc., in such a manner as to obtain on the same sheet a continuous record of the variations of the several meteorological elements.

meteorographic (mē'tē-ō-rō-grāf-ik), a. [= F. météorographique.] = Sp. meteorográfico; as meteorography + -ic.] Pertaining to meteorography.

meteorography (mē'tē-ō-rō-grāf-ī), n. [= F. météorographie.] = Sp. meteorografía, < Gr. meteoros, a meteor, + -graphie, < graphein, write.]

Meteorology; specifically, the registration of meteorological phenomena.

meteoroid (mē'tē-ō-rōid), n. [Gr. meteoros + -oid, term.] A body traveling in space, and of the same nature as those which on entering the earth's atmosphere become visible as meteors.

meteoroidal (mē'tē-ō-rōid-al), a. [Gr. meteoros + -al.] Pertaining to meteoroids or meteorors.

This remarkable group of planetoid or meteoroidal bodies forms a tolerably wide zone or ring between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 28.

meteorolite (mē'tē-ō-rō-līt), n. [= F. météorolithe.] = Sp. meteorolito, < Gr. meteoros, a meteor, + -lithos, a stone.] Same as meteorite.

meteorologic (mē'tē-ō-rō-lōj-ik), a. [= F. météorologique.] = Sp. meteorológico = It. meteorologico, < NL. meteorologicus, < Gr. metropo, raise up, < metropo, raised up; see metropo.] Same as meteorology; see meteorology.

Every extensive region (has) its own meteorologic conditions. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 7.

meteorological (mē'tē-ō-rō-lōj-ik-al), a. [Gr. meteorologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to weather; atmospheric; specifically, of or pertaining to the science of meteorology. Meteorological curve, a line or diagram which presents graphically the successive actual or mean values of any meteorological element. Meteorological elements, the fundamental data of meteorological observation; namely, the temperature, pressure, humidity, and electrical potential of the air; the rate of evaporation; the amount and kind of precipitation; the direction and velocity of the wind; the kind, direction of motion, and velocity of clouds; the duration of sunshine; and the intensity of solar and terrestrial radiation. Meteorological table, (a) A statistical table of meteorological data, also called meteorological register. (b) A table for correcting or reducing meteorological observations.

meteorologically (mē'tē-ō-rō-lōj-ik-al-i), adv. In a meteorological aspect; with reference to meteorological conditions; by means of meteorology, or according to meteorological principles or methods.

meteorologist (mē'tē-ō-rō-lōj-ist), n. [= F. météorologiste.] = Sp. meteorologista; as meteorology + -ist.] One who is versed in meteorology; an expert in the conduct and discussion of meteorological observations; a student of the laws of atmospheric motions and phenomena.

meteorology (mē'tē-ō-rō-lōj-ē-jī), n. [= F. météorologie.] = Sp. meteorología = It. meteorologia, < NL. meteorologia, < Gr. metropologia, a treatise on meteors or celestial phenomena, < metropo, speaking of meteors or celestial phenomena, < metropo, a meteor (Gr. metropo, celestial phenomena), + -logia, speak; see -ology.] The science which treats of the motions and phenomena of the earth's atmosphere; the scientific study of weather and climate, their causes, changes, relations, and effects. Abbreviated meteo.

In sundry animals we deny not a kind of natural meteorology, or innate presentation both of wind and weather. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., lib. 30.

Optical meteorology, the science of the luminous phenomena of the atmosphere.—Practical or applied meteorology, the study of the bearing and effect of weather and climate on human interests. It embraces especially: (1) weather forecasts; (2) medical meteorology, or the relation of weather and climate to health and disease; and (3) agricultural meteorology, or the relation of climate and weather to vegetable growth.—The new or higher meteorology, the explanation of the motions of the atmosphere, and the origin and development of storms, by deductive mathematical processes based on the laws of hydrodynamics and thermodynamics. Theoretical meteorology, the study of the physics and mechanics of the atmosphere, and the colonial influences affecting terrestrial atmospheres.

meteoromancy (mē'tē-ō-rō-man-si), n. [Gr. metropo, a meteor, + man, divination.] Divination by meteoric phenomena.

meteorometer (mē'tē-ō-rō-mē-tēr), n. [Gr. metropo, a meteor, + metron, a measure.] An apparatus for automatically transmitting from a local station, and showing or recording at a central station, the various weather items, such as direction of wind, rainfall, barometric pressure, temperature, etc. It is usually operated by electricity.

meteoroscope (mē'tē-ō-rō-skōp), n. [= F. météoroscope.] = Sp. meteoroscopio = It. meteoroscopo, < Gr. metropo, a meteor, + skopein, to look at, or observe, observing the heavenly bodies, < metropo, a meteor, < metropo, celestial phenomena, + skopein, view.] An instrument formerly in use for finding the angular distances of heavenly bodies. Isidore.

Meteoric Iron

respect; < metan, measure; see *mete*¹.] Measure; moderation; modesty.

And Mari told his life with meths
In a town that hilt Nazareth.
Metrical Homilies, p. 167.

meth¹⁴, n. [ME., < *meth*¹, n.] Moderate; mild; courteous.

Alle that myne mylde and meth
Went hem into Nazareth.
Curar Mundt, (Halliwell.)

meth²⁴, n. An obsolete form of *mead*¹.

meth³⁴, n. [Also meth; ME., a var. of moor: see *moor*¹.] Anger; wrath.

Quen the lordes of the lyfte lyked hymselfen
For to myne on his mon his meth that abyde.
Admirable Purne (ed. Morris), II, 139.

No tell thou neuer at hord no tale
To harme or shame thy felawe in sale,
For if he then withholds his meth,
It shal be wyll forcast thil dore.
Roberts Book (E. E. F. S.), p. 302.

methal (*meth'*al), n. [< meth(yl) + alcohol.] Same as methylic alcohol (which see, under alcohol).

methane (*meth'*an), n. [< meth(yl) + -ane.] A hydrocarbon (CH₄) belonging to the paraffin series, a colorless, odorless gas which may be reduced to a liquid by extreme pressure and cold. It is flammable when breathed in moderate quantity. It burns with a slightly luminous flame, and when mixed with seven or eight volumes of air explodes violently. It occurs in nature in the emanations of volcanoes and petroleum-wells. It also occurs in large quantity in the coal-measures, and when mixed with air constitutes the dreaded fire-damp of the miners. Also called marsh gas.

methanometer (meth'-a nom'-e-ter), n. [< meth-ane + (Gr. μτρον, measure).] An apparatus, devised by Monnier, to determine and indicate automatically the quantity of marsh-gas (methane) in coal-mines. It depends upon the change of level of the mercury in a manometer tube in which carbon dioxide is formed by the combination of the gas with the oxygen of the air under the action, for example, of an electric spark.

methel¹, n. An obsolete form of *mead*¹.

methel², n. See *meth*³.

metheglin (meth'-eg'-lin), n. [< W. meditglyn, < mead, mead (see *mead*¹), + (lyn, liquor).] Mead.

It is not my fault if I fill them out nectar and they run to metheglin.
H. Jonson, Masque of Hymen,
O'er our parch'd tongue the rich metheglin glides Gay, To a Lady, I

methemoglobin (met-he-mo-glo'-bin), n. [< Gr. μετ, with, + E. hemoglobin.] A modification of hemoglobin, into which it can be reconverted. It differs from hemoglobin in that its combined oxygen is not displaced by carbon monoxide nor given up in a vacuum.

methemoglobinemia (met-hē-mo-glo-bi-ne'-mi-), n. [< methemoglobin + (Gr. αμα, blood).] In pathol., the presence of methemoglobin in the blood. Med. News, LIII, 240.

methemoglobinuria (met-hē-mo-glo-bi-nū'-ri-), n. [< methemoglobin + (Gr. ουρον, urine).] In pathol., the presence of methemoglobin in the urine.

methene (meth'-ēn), n. [< meth(yl) + -ene.] Same as methylene.

methen (meth'-ēn), n. [*< meth*², month, *mead*¹.] A drinking-vessel formerly in use, especially intended for drinking mead or metheglin. The vessels identified as methens are of wood, cut out of a single piece, having a capacity of from one to three pints.

Methen from spe men in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin Ireland.

The Dunvegan cup, a methen of yew covered with silver mounts.
N. K. Cat. Spec. Exhib., 1892, No. 102.

methinks (meth'-inks), v. impers.; pret. methought. [< ME. me thinketh, < AS. me thyneth, it seems to me; see *me*¹ and *think*².] It seems to me; it appears to me. See *me*¹ and *think*².

method (meth'-od), n. [= OF. methodus, F. methode = Sp. metodo = Pg. metodo = It. metodo = D. U. Met. metodo = Sw. metod, < LL. methodus, methodos, a way of teaching or proceeding, < (Gr. methodos, a going after, pursuit, investigation, inquiry, method, system, < μεθ, after, + δωκ, way | 1. Orderly regulation of conduct with a view to the attainment of an end; systematic procedure subservient to the purpose of any business; the use of a complete set of rules for carrying out any plan or project; as, to observe method in business or study; without method success is improbable; in this and the next two senses only in the singular.

Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.
Shak., Hamlet, II, 2, 208.

Horace still charms with graceful negligence,
And without method talks us into sense.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 684.

The particular uses of method are various: but the general one is, to enable men to understand the things that are the subjects of it.
Bentham, Introductio to Morals and Legislation, xvi, l. note.

Where the habit of Method is present and effective, things the most remote and diverse in time, place, and outward circumstance are brought into mental continuity and succession, the more striking as the less expected.
Coderque, Method, § 11. (Encyc. Diet.)

2. A system, or complete set, of rules of procedure for attaining a given end; a short way to a desired result; specifically, in logic, a general plan for setting forth any branch of knowledge whatever; that branch of logic which teaches how to arrange thoughts for investigation or exposition.

Method hath been placed, and that not unwise, in logic, as a part of judgment. . . . the doctrine of method containeth the rules of judgment upon that which is to be delivered.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

Method is procedure according to principles.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. by W. E. D. B.), p. 310.

3. Any way or manner of conducting any business.

In this method of life it was once his fate to approach a clear fountain.
Bacon, Moral Fables, III.

4. A plan or system of conduct or action; the way or mode of doing or effecting something; as, a method of instruction; method of classification; the English method of pronunciation.

Therefore to know what more thou art than man,
Another method I must now begin.
Milton, P. R., IV, 540.

Let such persons . . . not quarrel with the Great Physician of souls for having cured them by easy and gentle methods.
South, Sermons, IX, 1.

Still less respectable appears it is extreme concern for those of our own blood which goes along with utter unconcern for those of other blood, when we observe its methods.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 71.

5. In music: (a) Manner of performance; technique; style. (b) A manner or system of teaching. (c) An instruction-book, systematically arranged. Acroasmatic, analytic, antecedental, methodic. See the adjectives. Arbogast's method. [Named after the inventor the Alsatian mathematician Louis Arbogast Antoine Arbogast 1759-1803, who himself named it the calculus de derivations.] A method for the development of the function of a function according to the powers of the variable of the latter function. Baconian method. See Baconian. Catechetical method, the method of teaching by questions addressed to the memory. Centrobatic method. See centrobatic. Comparative method, any method of investigation which rests upon the comparison of several groups of objects. Compositional method. Same as synthetic method. Correlative method. See correlative. Deductive method. See deductive. Definitive or divisive method. See divisive. Dialogic method. See dialogic. Differential method. (a) A method of estimating the value of a physical quantity by comparing it with another of the same kind the value of which is known and estimating the difference. See differential, and differential galvanometer. (b) A method, introduced by F. B. S. in duplex telegraphy for eliminating the effect of the transmitted current on the instruments at the transmitting station while leaving them available to record any message received at the same time. See telegraphy. Epidermic, erotematic, Eulian, exoscopic, expectant method. See the adjectives. Euler's method of elimination. See elimination. Genetic, graphical, historical method. See the adjectives. Horner's method of approximation. See approximation. Idiomatic method. Same as idiomatic. Inductive or experimental method, a method which depends upon making new observations.

Introspective method. See introspective. Lagrangean, lunar, magistral method. See the adjectives. Manco's method, a method of measuring the electrical resistance of a circuit in which there is an electromotive force. See resistance. Metaphysical or subjective method, one which rests on the assumption that the possibilities of thought are co-extensive with the possibilities of things. Method of adhesions. See the quotation.

At the recent meeting of the British Association, Dr. E. B. Tylor read an interesting paper on the laws of marriage and descent, illustrative of his ingenious method of studying ethnological phenomena. All myths and customs, on a close study, may by analysis be disintegrated, and are found to consist of certain elements. Dr. Tylor arranges these elements statistically, and by inquiring which occur simultaneously among various peoples proves that certain groups of such elements belong geographically together. This he calls the method of adhesions.
Science, XII, 211.

Method of agreement, that method of experimental inquiry in which some experiment being tried under a great variety of circumstances and found always to yield the same result, it is inferred that this result would be reached under all circumstances. Method of approaches. See approach. Method of avoidance, a method of experimentation in which the circumstances of the observation are specially chosen so that one usual source of error does not enter into the result. — Method of compensation, a method in which a source of error of unknown amount is got rid of by a special mechanical contrivance. — Method of concomitant variations, the method in which the known quantities on which the results of an experiment depend are made to vary with a view to ascertaining the values of the unknown quantities. — Method of correction, a method of experimentation in which a source of error is allowed for by calculation. This differs from the method of residues only in that the nature of the causes of the residual phenomena are known, and only their quantities remain to be determined. — Method of difference, that method in which an experiment is tried under conditions seeming to differ in but one material circumstance, and the difference in the two results is ascribed to that circumstance. — Method of dimensions, divisors, exclusions, fluxions. See dimension, divisor, etc. — Method of exhaustion, the method of approximation to the area of a curvilinear figure by means of inscribed and circumscribed polygons. — Method of increments, of indivisibles, of infusion, of limits. See increment, indivisible, etc. — Method of least squares. See square. — Method of residues. (a) That method of experimental inquiry in which from an observed quantity is subtracted the effects of known causes in order that the effects of unknown causes may be studied by themselves. (b) A method invented by Cauchy of treating the integral calculus. See residual. — Method of reversal, a method in which two experiments are made under different circumstances, in such a way that their results can be combined by calculation, so that the error shall be determined and eliminated. — Natural method, a method in which the order of nature is observed. See Jeannerian. — Null-method, a method of measurement in which the equality of two physical quantities is indicated when, on performing a specified operation, no effect is produced on the testing apparatus: for example, the Wheatstone bridge method of measuring electrical resistance. — Progressive method. Same as synthetic method. — Regressive or resolute method. Same as analytic method. — Scientific method, a method of investigation proceeding in a scientific manner, and setting out from fundamental and elementary principles, especially, the method of modern science. — Socratic method, the method of teaching by questions addressed to the understanding. — Subjective method. Same as metaphysical method. — Symbolical method. (a) A method in which symbols of operations are treated as if they were symbols of quantities. (b) A method in which, in analytical geom., the functions which vanish on straight lines, etc., are represented by single letters. (c) In algebra, a method in which, by the aid of unknown quantities are written as powers of polynomials. — Synthetic, progressive, or compositional method, a method in which we set out with general principles and proceed to deduce their consequences. — Tabular or tabellary method, the method of exhibiting the divisions of a subject by tables. — Total method, the method of a whole science. — Partial method, the method of a particular part of a science. — Universal or general method, a method applicable to all problems, or to a very wide class of problems. — Special or particular method, one applicable to a small class of problems.

Methodic (meth'-od'ik), a. [= F. methodique = Sp. metódico = Pg. metódico = It. metódico (cf. D. U. metódisch = Dan. metodisk).] < LL. methodicus, following a method (methodi methodici, physicians known as methodists), < (Gr. methodikos, working by rule, following a method, systematic (oi methodoi, physicians known as methodists), < methodos, a method; see method.] Pertaining to or characterized by method; conformed or conforming to a method; as, the methodic principle or sect in medicine.

The legislator whose measures produce evil instead of good, notwithstanding the extensive and methodic inquiries which helped him to decide, cannot be held to have committed more than error of reasoning.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 77.

Methodic doubt. See *doubt*¹.

Methodical (meth'-od'i'-kal), a. [< methodic + -al.] Characterized by or exhibiting method; disposed or acting in a systematic way; systematic; orderly; as, the methodical arrangement of objects or topics; methodical accounts; a methodical man.

When I am old, I will be as methodical an hypocrite as any pair of lawn sleeves in Savoy.
Shirley, Grateful Servant, II, 1.

I have done it in a confused manner, and without the nice divisions of art; for grief is not methodical.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I, vi.

Methodically (meth'-od'i'-kal-i), adv. In a methodical manner; according to a method; with method or order.

Methodics (meth'-od'iks), n. [Pl. of methodic; see -ics.] The science of method; methodology. Methodisation, methodias, etc. See methodization, etc.

Methodism (meth'-od'-izm), n. [< method (see Methodist) + -ism.] 1. The principle of acting according to a fixed or strict method; the system or practice of methodists; as, methodism in medicine, or in conduct.

This system [of medical doctrine] was known as methodism, its adherents as the methodici or methodists.
Encyc. Brit., XV, 902.

Specifically—2. [cap.] The doctrine and polity of the Methodist Church. See Methodist Church, under Methodist.

Methodist (meth-'od-ist), n. and a. [< method + -ist.] 1. n. 1. [2. a.] One who is characterized by strict adherence to method; one who thinks or acts according to a fixed system or definite principles; one who is thoroughly versed in method.

The finest methodists, according to Aristotle's golden rule of artificial bounds, condemn geometrical precepts in arithmetic or arithmetical precepts in geometry as irregular and abusive.

G. Harvey, Pierce's Supererogation.

The great thinkers of all times have been strict methodists.

Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 128.

2. One of a sect of ancient physicians who practised by method or theory. Compare Hippocratist, 2.

As many more
As methodist Musus kild with hellebore
In autumn last.

Marston, Scourge of Villainy, Sat. 1.

The methodists agreed with the empirics in one point, in their contempt for anatomy; but, strictly speaking, they were dogmatists though with a dogma different from that of the Hippocratic school.

Encyc. Brit., XV. 502.

3. A member of the Christian denomination founded by John Wesley (1703-91). The name was first applied to Wesley and his companions by their fellow-students at Oxford on account of their methodical habits in study and in religious life.

Thus Bath yields a confused rotation of diversions, and people of all ways of thinking, even from the libertine to the methodist, have it in their power to complete the day with employment agreeable to their taste and disposition.

Life of Quin (reprint 1857), p. 50.

Dialectic Methodists, a name given to certain Roman Catholic priests of France, during the seventeenth century, who opposed by argument the doctrines of the Huguenots. Also called Romish or Papish Methodists.

Free Methodists, a Methodist denomination in the United States, established in 1840 at Pekin in New York. Its members place especial emphasis upon the doctrine of entire sanctification and eternal punishment. They rigidly enforce the rule for simplicity of dress, and prohibit the use of chair or musical instrument in church service; they have abandoned episcopacy, and have one superintendent elected every four years.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Methodism or the Methodists; belonging to or agreeing with the general body of Methodists: as, Methodist principles; a Methodist church. — The Methodist Church, a Christian body existing in several distinct church organizations, the most important of which are that known in England as the Wesleyan and that known in the United States as the Methodist Episcopal Church. These two bodies do not differ materially in doctrine, worship, or ecclesiastical organization. They are evangelical, and Arminian in theology. Their worship is generally non-liturgical. Each Methodist society, or local church, is organized in classes under class-leaders, the different societies, which are sometimes grouped in circuits, are combined in districts, each of which is, in the United States, under the superintendence of a presiding elder. The American churches also have bishops, who are not diocesan, but itinerant, possessing concurrent jurisdiction over the whole church. The highest ecclesiastical court is the General Conference, which meets every fourth year. In the United States lay delegates have been admitted to the Conference since 1872, and in England since 1880, before which dates the Conference was a purely clerical body. Other Methodist churches are: The Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Calvinistic in theology formed from the Convent of Hunsdon's Connection, which is congregational in polity; the Methodist New Connection, which gives a larger degree of power to the laity than does the old connection; the Bible Christians; the Primitive Methodists; the United Methodist Free Churches, a combination of three pre-existing Methodist organizations; and the Wesleyan Reform Union. All the above are British organizations. In the United States, the Methodist Episcopal Church exists in two distinct organizations: the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church (South). There is also an African Methodist Episcopal Church, an African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church, all composed entirely of colored Methodists; the Evangelical Association, popularly though inaccurately termed German Methodists, or Abolitionists, from the name of their founder; the United Brethren in Christ, which is essentially though not nominally a Methodist body; the Methodist Protestant Church, which rejects episcopacy; and the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America. In Canada several of the Methodist bodies have been consolidated into a single organization, called the Methodist Church of Canada. All these bodies agree in having a consolidated ministry for each body, and in each, with the exception of the Methodist Episcopal Church (which in 1900, at its quadrennial session, removed the time limits, ministers are subject to change of parish within certain definite periods — a feature of Methodist economy called "the itinerancy).

Methodistic (meth-'od-ist-ik), a. [< Methodist + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to methodism or methodists; characterized by or exhibiting strict adherence to method; hence, strict or exacting, as in religion or morals.

Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men!

Byron, Hints from Horace.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Methodist Church; characteristic of the Methodists or Methodism: as, Methodistic principles or practices.

Methodistical (meth-'od-ist-ik-al), a. [< Methodist + -al.] Same as Methodistic, 2.

The precise number of methodistical marks you know best. Dr. Loxington, Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists Compared, p. xii.

Methodistically (meth-'od-ist-ik-ly), adv. In a methodistic manner; specifically [cap.], after the manner of the Methodists; as regards Methodism.

Methodization (meth-'od-i-zā-'shon), n. [< methodize + -ation.] The act or process of methodizing or reducing to method; the state of being methodized. Also spelled methodisation.

The conceptions, then, which we employ for the colligation and methodization of facts do not develop themselves from within, but are impressed upon the mind from without.

J. S. Mill, Logic, IV. B. § 2.

Methodize (meth-'od-iz), v. t. pret. and pp. methodized, ppr. methodizing. [< method + -ize.] 1. trans. To reduce to method; dispose in due order; arrange in a convenient manner.

The wisdom of God hath methodized the course of things unto the best advantage of goodness.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I. 30.

Science . . . is simply common sense rectified, extended, and methodized.

J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 124.

II. intrans. To be methodical; use method.

The mind . . . is disposed to generalize and methodize to excess.

Coleridge, Method, § 1.

Also spelled methodise.

Methodizer (meth-'od-i-zēr), n. One who methodizes. Also spelled methodiser.

He was a careful methodizer of his knowledge.

Needler, South Webster, p. 213.

Methodological (meth-'od-ol-og-ik-al), a. [< methodology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to methodology.

If there were several competing methods of geometry geometers would inevitably be involved in the outset of their study in methodological discussion.

H. Süsser, Methods of Ethics, p. 5.

Methodologist (meth-'od-ol-og-ist), n. [< methodology + -ist.] One who is versed in or treats of methodology.

Methodology (meth-'od-ol-og-ē), n. [*< Gr. metho-, method-, < metron, < metra, speak; see -ology.*] 1. A branch of logic whose office it is to show how the abstract principles of the sciences are to be applied to the production of knowledge; the doctrine of definition and division; in a broader sense, the science of method in scientific procedure.

That part of logic which is conversant with the perfection, with the well being of thought is the doctrine of method.

The rival originators of modern Methodology, Descartes and Bacon, vie with each other in the stress that they lay on this point, and the latter's warning against the "methodical mode" of ordinary thought is peculiarly needed in this question.

H. Süsser, Methods of Ethics, p. 118.

2. A treatise on method.

methomania (meth-'o-mā-'ni-ā), n. [*NL., < Gr. metho-, meth-, strong drink (see metad), + mania, madness.*] In pathol., an irresistible morbid craving for intoxicating substances; dipsomania.

Dipsomania is a form of physical disease, and it has been aptly defined as an uncontrollable and intermittent impulse to take alcoholic stimulants, or any other agent . . . which causes intoxication in short a methomania.

R. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 34.

methought (mē-'thāt'), n. Pretense of methinks.

methridatum, n. See methridetum.

methule (meth-'ul), n. Same as methy.

methy (meth-'i), n.; pl. methyses (-iz-). A name of the burbot.

methyl (meth-'il), n. [*< Gr. meth-, mend, + yl, wood.*] The hypothetical radical (CH₃) of wood-spirit and its derivatives. It is analogous to ethyl in its chemical relations. — Methyl alcohol, green, mercaptan. See alcohol, etc.

Methylal (meth-'il-al), n. [< methyl + alcohol.] Methylene dimethyl ether, CH₃OCCH₃, a liquid product of the oxidation of methylic alcohol. It has a pleasant odor, and by oxidation passes into formic acid.

Methylamine (meth-'il-am-in), n. [< methyl + amine.] A colorless gas (NH₂CH₃) having a strong ammoniacal odor, and resembling ammonia in many of its reactions. It may be regarded as ammonia (NH₃) in which the radical methyl (CH₃) has been substituted for a hydrogen atom. When brought in contact with a lighted taper it burns with a livid yellowish flame. Methylamine may be condensed to a liquid, it has not been solidified. It is exceedingly soluble in water, and forms, with acids, crystallizable salts.

Methylate (meth-'il-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. methylated, ppr. methylating. [< methyl + -ate.]

To mix or impregnate with methylic alcohol or methyl. Methylated spirit, spirit of wine or alcohol containing ten per cent. of wood-naphtha (methylic alcohol). The naphtha communicates a disagreeable flavor, which renders the spirit unfit for drinking. It is of much use in the arts as a solvent, for preserving apocynus, in the manufacture of varnishes, for burning in spirit-lamps, etc.

Methyl-blue (meth-'il-blū), n. A coal-tar color prepared by treating spirit-blue (see spirit-blue, 2) with methyl chloride. It is used to dye light-blue tints on silk, and possesses a purer tone than spirit-blue.

Methylconine (meth-'il-kō-nin), n. [< methyl + conine.] One of the alkaloids found in commercial conine.

Methylcrotonic (meth-'il-kro-'ton-'ik), n. In chem., used only in the following phrase: — Methylcrotonic acid. Same as crotonic acid (which see, under crotonic).

Methylene (meth-'il-ēn), n. [< methyl + -ene.] A bivalent hydrocarbon radical (CH₂) which does not exist free, but occurs in many compounds, as methylene iodide, (CH₂)₂. Also called methene.

Methylene-blue (meth-'il-ēn-blū), n. A coal-tar color prepared by treating dimethylaniline successively with hydrochloric acid, sodium nitrite, sulphureted hydrogen, ammonium salt, and zinc chloride. It is used in dyeing, and produces fast blues on cotton, leather, and jute, but not on wool or silk. It is also an important bacteriologic reagent.

Methylic (me-'thil-'ik), a. [< methyl + -ic.] Containing or related to the radical methyl. — Methylic alcohol, ether, etc. See the nouns.

Methyl-salicylic (meth-'il-sal-'il-'ik), a. Containing methyl in combination with salicylic acid. Methyl-salicylic acid, the methyl ester of salicylic acid, and the chief ingredient of wintergreen-oil, from Gaultheria procumbens, a colubina, agreeably smelling oil which forms salts that are easily decomposed.

Methyl-violet (meth-'il-vi-'ol-ēt), n. A coal-tar color produced by the direct oxidation of pure dimethylaniline with chlorid of copper. Also called Purpurin.

Methymnion (meth-im-'ni-on), n.; pl. methymnia (-i). [*NL., < Gr. methym-, < methy, after, + mnion, hymn.*] In anc. pros., a short colon after an antistrophe.

Methysis (meth-'i-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. methy-, drunkenness.] < methy-, to be drunken with wine. In pathol., drunkenness; intoxication.

metic (me-'tik), n. [*Irreg. for methe, < L. metheo, < Gr. metheo, a resident alien, prop. adj., changing one's abode, < meta, over (denoting change), + oikos, house, abode; see ecology.*] An emigrant or immigrant; specifically, in ancient Greece, a resident alien who in general bore the burdens of a citizen, and had some of the citizen's privileges; hence, any resident alien.

To all men rich and poor, citizens and metics, the comparative excellence of the democracy . . . was now manifest.

Græc. Hist. Greece, VI. 2.

The Patricians, as distinguished from the Patres, formed an aristocracy as compared with their freedom or other dependents, or with the metics or strangers that adorned among them, or with the alien population that were permitted on terms more or less hard, to cultivate their lands.

W. E. Harris, Arvan Household, p. 102.

meticulous (me-'tik-'ū-lus), a. [= F. meticulous, < L. meticulous, full of fear, < metus, fear.] Timid; over-careful.

Melancholy and meticulous heads

A list of Platon super-subtle and meticulous consistency

Amer. Jour. Philol., IX. 200.

meticulously (me-'tik-'ū-lus-ly), adv. Timidly. More circumspcctly, not meticulously.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I. 23.

metif (mē-'tif), n. [< F. metif, OF. metif, of mixed breed; see metif, and cf. mestier, metier.] The offspring of a white person and a quadroon.

meting (mē-'ting), n. [*ME. meting, < AS. metung, verbal n. of metan, mete; see met.] Measuring.*

meting, n. A Middle-English form of meeting.

meting, n. [*ME. meting, < AS. metung, verbal n. of metan, dream; see met.] A dream.*

Joseph . . . he that reside so

The kynge's meynor, Pharus.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 282.

Metis (mē-'tis), n. [*< Gr. Metis, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and sometimes called the mother of Athena; a personification of metis, wisdom, prudence.*] 1. In Gr. myth., a goddess personifying prudence, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and first wife of Zeus. — 2. The ninth of the planetoids in the order of discovery, first observed by Graham at Markree, Ire-

Abbreviations: Metepo from the southern to the northern part of the eastern plateau of S. Iran.

work, cut in the same block with one triglyph or metope. It was so called because in the primitive form of which the later triglyphs represent the ends of the ceiling beam - the metopes were left open as windows and were thus literally apertures between the beams. The metopes were characteristically ornamented with sculpture in high relief, but they were frequently left plain or adorned simply with painting. See cuts under Poric, metopionak, and metope.

2. In cool, same as lucos. Huxley.

metrist (met'rist), n. [< metric + -ist.] A metrical writer; a metristian.

Counterpoint, therefore, is not to be achieved by the metrist, even though he be Pindar himself.

Amey. Brit., XIX, 202.

metrist (met'rist), n. [Pl. of metric: see -ics.] The philosophical and mathematical theory of measurement.

metrist (met'rist), n. [Pl. of metric: see -ics.] 1. The art of versification. — 2. The science or doctrine which treats of rhythm in language and its employment in poetic composition. Both as an art and as a science metrics is a branch of rhythmics, and relates to rhythm in language as music or harmonics does to musical rhythm, and orchestics (regarded as an art or science by the ancients) to rhythm in the movements of the body. It is a distinct science from grammar in its proper sense, the only department of which approaching metrics is that called prosody — that is, the study of quantity or the determination of long and short in spoken language. As a matter of convenience grammarians have added to this elementary or empiric treatise on versification, and as in traditional and popular usage prosody is made equivalent to metrics. In metrical composition the unit is the time (mora) or the syllable. In the nomenclature of modern metric syllables combine into feet or measures, these into lines, and lines into stanzas or strophes. In the more exact and complete terminology of ancient metrics lines or syllables combine into feet or measures, measures into cola, lines (verses), or periods, periods into systems or strophes, strophes into pericopes, and lines, periods, systems, or pericopes into poems. Also metrist.

Metridium (mē-trid'i-um), n. [N.L., < Gr. μετρίδιον, < μετρα, womb: see metr.] A genus of sea-anemones. M. maritimum is the commonest sea-anemone of the New England coast, found in abundance

Sea anemone Metridium maritimum open in flood in quiet tide-pools on rocks and submerged timber. When full-blown or distended with water this anemone may be eight or ten inches in diameter.

metrification (met'ri-fi-ka'shon), n. [< metrist + -ation (see -ification).] The making of verses; a metrical composition. [Rare.]

Should I flounder awhile without a tumble
Through this metrification of Catullus.
Tennyson, Hecateanallabics.

metrifier (met'ri-fi-er), n. A metrist; a versifier.

metrify (met'ri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. metrified, ppr. metrifying. [< OF. metriser, < ML. metrificare, write in meter; < L. metrum, meter (see meter), + facere, make: see -fy.] To compose meters or verses.

In metrifying his base can not well be larger than a metre of six. Pattenham, Art of Eng. Poetic, p. 79.

Metrinæ (met'ri-nē), n. pl. [< Metrus + -inæ.] A group of beetles of the family Carabidae, typified by the genus Metrus, having the body not pedunculate, the posterior coxae separated, the prosternum prolonged at the tip, and the mandibles with a setigerous puncture. Also Metrini, as a tribe of Carabini.

metrist (mē'trist), n. [= Sp. metrista, < ML. metrista, a writer in meter, a poet, < L. metrum, meter: see meter and -ist.] One who is versed in poetic meter or rhythm; a metrical writer; a metristian.

Coloridge himself, from natural sweetness of ear, was the best metrist among modern English poets.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 267.

metritis (mē'trit'is), n. [N.L., < Gr. μετρίτις (see metr), womb, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus, especially of its middle coat.

Metrius (mē'tri-us), n. [N.L., < Gr. μετριος, of moderate size, < μετρο, measure: see meter.] The typical genus of Metrinæ, founded by Eschscholtz in 1829. M. contractus is a Californian species found in woods under stones.

metrocarcinoma (mē-tri-kār-si-nō'mā), n.; pl. metrocarcinomata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < Gr. μετρα, womb, + καρκίνωμα, a cancer: see carcinoma.] In pathol., carcinoma of the uterus.

metochrome (mē'trō-krōm), n. [< Gr. μετροχρῶμα, a measure, + χρῶμα, color.] An instrument for measuring colors.

metocracy (mē'trōk'ri-si), n. [< Gr. μετροκρατία, mother, + -κρατία, < κρατειν, rule.] Rule by the mother of the family.

The theory which regards metocracy and communal marriage as a stage through which the human race in general has passed. The Academy, Feb. 15, 1888, p. 130.

metrograph (mē'trō-grāf), n. [< Gr. μετρογραφία, a measure, + γραφειν, write.] An apparatus for measuring and recording the rate of speed of a railway locomotive at any moment, and the time of arrival at and departure from each station.

metrolacon (mē'trō-lā-kōn), n.; pl. metrolacra (-kā). [L., also metrolaconum, < Gr. μετρολακων, neut. of μετρολακος, equiv. to μετρολας, of a mother, specifically of Cybele as the mother of the gods, < μετρο, mother: see mother.] In pross., same as gallambus.

metrological (mē'trō-lōj'i-kāl), a. [< metrology + -ical.] Of or pertaining to metrology.

metrologist (mē'trō-lō-jist), n. [< metrology + -ist.] A student of or an expert in metrology.

metrology (mē'trō-lō-jī), n. [= F. métrologie = Sp. metrología = Pg. It. metrologia, < Gr. μετρολογία, a measure, + -λογία, < λογιω, speak: see -ology.] The science of weights and measures. It has two parts, one relating to the art of weighing and measuring, and the other accumulating facts in regard to units of measure which are now or have formerly been in use. Documentary metrology, the science of ancient weights and measures based upon the study of monuments, especially of standards in regard to which there is sufficient evidence that they were intended to represent certain measures.

Historical metrology, the investigation of the weights and measures of the past, and especially of the ancients. It is divided into documentary and inductive metrology. — Inductive metrology, that based upon the measurement of a large number of objects in regard to any one of which there is little or no evidence that it was intended to have any exact measure.

metromania (mē'trō-mā-ni-ā), n. [= F. metromanie = Sp. metromanía = Pg. It. metromania, < Gr. μετρομανία, measure, + μανία, madness.] A mania for writing poetry.

metromaniac (mē'trō-mā-ni-āk), a. [< metromania + -ac.] Characteristic of or affected with metromania; excessively fond of writing verses.

He seems to have suddenly acquired the facility of versification, and to display it with almost metromaniac eagerness.

W. Taylor, Survey of German Poetry, I, 193. (Darics)

metrometer (mē'trō-mē'tēr), n. [< Gr. μετρομετρον, measure, + μετρον, measure.] Same as metronome.

metrometer (mē'trō-mē'tēr), n. [< Gr. μετρομετρον, the womb, + μετρον, measure.] Same as hystero-meter.

metronome (mē'trō-nōm), n. [= F. métronome, < Gr. μετρον, a measure, + νόμος, law: see nomos.] A mechanical contrivance for marking time, especially as an aid in musical study or performance. In its usual form it consists of a double pendulum (oscillating on a pivot near its center), the lower end of which is weighted with a ball of lead, while the upper end carries a weight of brass that may be moved up or down. When the latter weight is moved up, the rate of oscillation is slower; when it is moved down, the rate is faster. The upper end of the pendulum is graduated so that any desired number of oscillations per minute can be secured. The whole is connected with clock-work having a strong spring, whereby the oscillation may be maintained for several minutes, and each oscillation may be marked by a distinct tick or click. The invention of the metronome was claimed by J. N. Maelzel in 1816, but it is probable that he only adapted and introduced it to general use. The instrument is used for recording the tempo desired by a composer, and also as a means of teaching beginners the habit of keeping strict time. Its use is indicated in printed music by the metronomic mark (which see, under mark). Sometimes an attachment is added for striking a bell at every second, third, fourth, or sixth oscillation, so as to mark primary accents; such a metronome is called a bell-metronome. Various other metronomes have been invented, most of which are based upon the pendulum principle. Abbreviated M.

Model of a Metronome. The dotted line shows the position of the pendulum.

metronomic (mē'trō-nōm'ik), a. [< metronome + -ic.] Pertaining to a metronome, or to tempo as indicated by a metronome. — Metronomic mark. See mark.

metronomy (mē'trō-nōm'i), n. [< metronome + -y.] The act, process, or science of using a metronome, or of indicating tempo by reference to a metronome.

metronymic (mē'trō-nīm'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. μετρονυμικός, named after one's mother, < μετρον, mother, + ονυμ, < ὀνομα, name: see onym.] < Gr. μετρονυμικός, patronymic.] I. a. Derived from the name of a mother or other female ancestor: correlative to patronymic: as, a metronymic name.

II. n. A maternal name; a name derived from the mother or a maternal ancestor.

Of metronymies, as we may call them, used as personal designations, we find examples both before and after the conquest. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, v, 389.

metropertinitis (mē'trō-per-i-tō'nīt'is), n. [N.L., < Gr. μετροπεριτίτις, the womb, + N.L. peritonitis, q. v.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus and peritoneum.

metrophlebitis (mē'trō-flē-bīt'is), n. [N.L., < Gr. μετροφλεβίτις, the womb, + N.L. phlebitis, q. v.] Inflammation of the veins of the womb.

metropolis (mē'trō-pol'), n. [< (OF. metropole, F. métropole: see metropolis.] A metropolis; Hallweil.

Dublin being the metropole and chief city of the whole land, and where are his majesty's principal and high courts. Holmshed, Ireland, an. 1878.

metropolis (mē'trō-pol'), n. [= F. métropole = Sp. metrópoli = Pg. It. metropoli, < L.L. metropolis, < Gr. μετροπολις, a mother state or city (a state or city in relation to its colonies), also a capital city, < μετρο, = F. mother, + -πολις, state, city: see polis.] 1. In ancient Greece, the mother city or parent state of a colony, as Corinth of Corcyra and Syracuse, or Phocæa of Massalia (Marseilles), the colony being independent, but usually maintaining close relations with the metropolis.

This Sidon, the ancient Metropolis of the Phœnicians (now called Saida), in likelihood was built by Sidon. Purchase, Pilgrimage, p. 90.

Colonies may be regarded as independent states, attached to their metropolis by ties of sympathy and common descent, but no further.

W. Smith, Dict. Greek and Roman Antiq., p. 314.

2. Later, a chief city; a seat of government; in the early church, the see or chief city of an ecclesiastical province.

We stopped at Pavia, that was once the metropolis of a kingdom, but at present a poor town. Addison, Travels in Italy.

3. In modern usage: (a) Specifically, the see or seat of a metropolitan bishop.

That stood out against the holy church,
The great metropolis and see of Rome.

Shak., K. John, v, 2, 72.

Marchanopolis lost its metropolitan rights, though it still continued a see; and Diobolus or Zagara became the Metropolis of the province.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I, 44.

(b) The capital city or seat of government of a country, as London, Paris, or Washington. (c) A chief city; a city holding the first rank in any respect within a certain territorial range; as, New York is the commercial metropolis of the United States. — 4. In zoölogy, and bot., the place of most numerous representation of a species by individuals, or of a genus by species; the focus of a generic area. See generic.

metropolitan (mē'trō-pol'i-tān), a. and n. [= F. métropolitain = Sp. Pg. It. metropolitano, < L.L. metropolitānus, of a metropolis, < metropolis, a metropolis: see metropolis.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a metropolis, in any sense; residing in or connected with a metropolis; as, metropolitan enterprise; metropolitan police.

The bishop.

That metropolitan volcanoes make
Whose Stygian throats breathe darkness all day long.
Cooper, Task, III, 727.

2. Of or pertaining to the chief see of an ecclesiastical province; as, a metropolitan church.

A bishop at that time had power in his own diocese over all other ministers there, and a metropolitan bishop's ordinary preeminence above other bishops.

Hosker, Lectures, Forty, vii, 8, 8.

Very near the metropolitan church there are several places of marble edifices and columns.

Pococke, Description of the East, II, I, 263.

Metropolitan district. See district.

II. n. 1. A colony of the mother city or parent state of a colony. See metropolis, I.

Both metropolitans and colonists styled themselves Helens, and were recognized as such by each other.

Orde, Hist. Greece, II, 316.

2. Eccles.: (a) In the early Christian church, the bishop of the municipal capital of a province or eparchy, who had a general ecclesiastical tical superintendence over the bishops and churches of his province, confirmed, ordained, and when necessary excommunicated the bishops, and convened and presided over the provincial synods. The superiority in rank of the bishop of the principal sees was so early established that many authorities have held that the office of metropolitan (including also under this title the primates of patriarchal sees) was of apostolic origin. In the developed organization under the Christian emperors a metropolitan ranked above an ordinary bishop and below a patriarch or exarch. In medieval times the power of most of the metropolitans in western countries became much diminished, while that of the diocesan bishops and the pope was relatively increased. See archbishop and primate.

By consent of all churches . . . the precedence in each province was assigned to the bishop of the Metropolis, who was called the first bishop, the Metropolitan.

Barron, The Pope's Supremacy.

The bishops of (Cyprus) were . . . subjected to the Latin metropolitan, who was bound to administer justice among them.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 167.

Metrosideros (mē'trō-si-dē'rō-s), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Metrosideron + -os.] A subtribe of plants of the natural order Myrtaceae, the myrtle family, typified by the genus Metrosideros. It is characterized by many free stamens, arranged in one or many series, or connate in clusters, opposite the petals, myrtle-like or large and feather-veined leaves, and flowers almost always in corymbs or short racemes. It embraces 11 genera and about 60 species, which are found principally in Australia and New Caledonia.

Metrosideros (mē'trō-si-dē'rō-s), n. [NL. (Banks, 1788), < Gr. μῆτρα, the pith or heart of a tree, lit. womb, + σιδερος, iron: see siderite.] A genus of plants of the natural order Myrtaceae and the tribe Septospermeae. Type of the subtribe Metrosideros.

They are trees or shrubs, sometimes climbing when young, and independent when old. The ovules are arranged in many series, and horizontal or ascending; the leaves are opposite and feather-veined; the flowers are usually showy, prevailing red, strongly marked by their crown of very numerous long erect stamens, and borne in dense terminal three-lobed cymes. There are about 20 species, growing chiefly in the Pacific Islands, from New Zealand to the Sandwich Islands, one species each in tropical Australia, the Indian archipelago, and South Africa. M. vera is the iron tree of Java, and M. robusta the iron tree of New Zealand. Various species are known in cultivation. Nine fossil species of this genus have been described, chiefly from the European Tertiary, but one occurs in the Middle Cretaceous of Greenland.

Impatiens Metrosideros (v. n.).

metrotome (mē'trō-tōm), n. [Gr. μῆτρα, womb, + τομή, cutting, < τέρω, < τέρω, cut.] In surg., an instrument used to divide the neck of the uterus.

Metroxylon (mē'trō-si-lon), n. [NL. (Rottbüll), < Gr. μῆτρα, the pith or heart of a tree, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of palms, known to older writers as Sagus (Blume), of the tribe Lepidocarpaceae and the subtribe Calamæ. They bear fruit but once, and are characterized by robust stems and branching spikes. They are large trees with terminal suberect pinnately cut leaves having opposite linear-lanceolate segments; the spines have a coriaceous prickly surface. Seven species are known, indigenous in the Malay archipelago, New Guinea, and the Fiji Islands. M. loricis and M. Rumphii, natives of Sum, the Malayan Islands, etc., are the proper sagus palms. The former grows from 25 to 50 feet high, and has a rather thick trunk, covered with leaf-scars, which bears a graceful crown of large pinnate leaves, from the center of which arise the pyramidal flower-spikes. The latter is a much smaller tree, further distinguished by the sharp spines borne on its leaves and flower-stems. These trees flower when about fifteen years old, and require nearly three years to ripen their fruit, after which they die. (See sagu.) M. Rumphii is a littoral tree which forms dense growths. M. loricis grows in swamps. M. amicum, a species in the Friendly Islands, yields seeds which serve as a vegetable ivory.

mezurah (mē-zū-rā), n.; pl. mezuruth (-zoth). [Heb.] Among the Jews, an emblem consisting of a piece of parchment, inscribed on one side with the words found in Deut. vi. 4-9 and xi. 13-21, on the other with "Shaddai," the Almighty, and so placed in a small hollow cylinder that the divine name is visible through an opening covered by a glass. This cylinder is affixed to the right-hand door-post in Jewish houses. The Jews believed that the mezurah had the virtue of an amulet in protecting a house from disease and evil spirits.

Every pious Jew, as often as he passes the mezurah, in leaving the house or in entering it, touches the divine name with the finger of his right hand, puts it to his mouth, and kisses it, saying in Hebrew "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore" (Ps. cxli. 8).

mezzotint (mez'g-ōr med'zō-tint), n. [Cf. It. mezzotinto, < mezzo, middle, half, < tinto (< L. tinctus), painted, pp. of tingere, paint; see tint, tinge.] A method of engraving on copper or steel of which the essential feature is the bur-nishing and scraping away, to a variable extent, of a uniformly roughened surface consisting of minute incisions, accompanied by a bur, produced by an instrument called a cradle or scraper. This surface is left nearly undisturbed in the deepest shadows of the subject, but is partially removed in the middle tints, and completely in the highest lights. Thus treated, the plate, when inked, prints impressions graded in light and shade according to the requirements of the design, from a rich velvety and perfectly uniform black up through every variation of tone to brilliant white, or showing, when desirable, the sharpest contrasts between the extremes. This style of engraving, invented by Van Meegen, a Dutchman, in 1641, though erroneously ascribed to his pupil Prince Rupert, has been pursued with most success in England. The defect of the process is that it does not admit of clear and sharp delineation of forms; hence in modern practice the outline of the design is strongly etched with acid before the cradle is used, and texture is often given to the finished plate by lines produced by dry-point etching.

This afternoon Prince Rupert show'd me with his own hands a new way of graving call'd Mezzo Tinta.
 Evelyn, Diary, March 12, 1661.

Mezzotint print, in photog., a picture having some resemblance in texture, finish, or effect to a mezzotint engraving. See the quotation.

Others modify the effect and soften their paper prints by interposing a sheet of glass, of gelatin, or mica, or of tissue paper between the negative and the paper, in this way are made the so-called Mezzotint Prints.
 Lea, Photography, p. 194.

mezzotint (mez'-o- or med'-zo-tint), v. t. [< mezzotint, n.] To engrave in mezzotint; represent in or as if in mezzotint.

How many times I had lingered to study the shadows of the leaves mezzotinted upon the turf.
 Lowell, Study Windows, p. 54.

Facilitated by Kneller in 1716, and mezzotinted a year later by Smith.
 Scribner's Mag., III. 542.

mezzotinter (mez'-o- or med'-zo-tin-ter), n. An artist who works in mezzotint; an engraver of mezzotints.

1700. Mr. John Smith; The best mezzotinter, . . . who united softness with strength, and finishing with freedom.
 Walpole, Catalogue of Engravers, v. 202.

mezzotinto (med-zō-tin'-to), n. and v. Same as mezzotint.

mf. In music, the abbreviation of mezzo forte.

M. P. H. An abbreviation of Master of Fox-hounds.

M. ft. [Abbr. of L. mistura fiat: Mistura, mixture; fiat, 3d pers. sing. subj. pres. of facere, to do; see fiat.] In phar., let a mixture be made; used in medical prescriptions.

Mg. In chem., the symbol for magnesium.

M. G. (a) An abbreviation of Major-General.
 (b) In musical notation, an abbreviation of the French main gauche (left hand), indicating that a note or passage is to be played with the left hand.

Mgr. An abbreviation of Monsieur or of Monsieur.

M. H. G. An abbreviation of Middle High German. In the etymologies in this work it is written more briefly MHG.

mho (mō), n. [A reversed form of ohm.] A term proposed by Sir William Thomson for the unit of electrical conductivity. It is the conductivity of a body whose resistance is one ohm.

mhometer (mōm'e-tēr), n. [< mho + (Gr. μέτρον, metron, measure).] An instrument for measuring electrical conductivity.

mi (mē), n. [It., etc., orig. taken from the first syllable of L. mira; see gamut.] In solmization, the syllable used for the third tone of the scale. In the scale of C this tone is E, which is therefore sometimes called mi in France, Italy, etc.—MI contra fa, in medieval music, the interval of the tritone, "the devil in music," so named because it occurred between mi (B) of the "hard" hexachord and fa (F) of the "natural" hexachord; see hexachord and tritone. Also called mi contra fa.

miana-bug (mi-an'-ū-bug), n. [< Miana, a town in Persia, + būg.] A kind of tick, Argas persicus, of the family Trodidae, whose bite is very painful and said to be even fatal. See Argas.

misauli (mi-on'-h), n. [Malay (F).] The volatile oil of Melaleuca flariflora. It closely resembles cajuput-oil.

miargyrite (mi-ār'-ji-rīt), n. [< (Gr. μίαν, less, + ἀργύρος, silver, + -ίτης, -ite).] In mineral., a sulphid of antimony and silver, occurring in monoclinic crystals of an iron-black color with dark cherry-red streak.

miarolitic (mi-ar'-ō-lit'ik), a. [< (Gr. μίαν, stained, impure, + λίθος, stone).] A word introduced by Rosenbusch to designate the structure of rocks of the granitic family, where the magma in assuming a crystalline character has shrunk in dimensions so as to leave numerous small cavities, giving the mass a structure somewhat analogous to that commonly designated as saccharoidal, as in the case of metamorphic limestone, and also to that to which the name drusy is sometimes applied.

mias (mī'as), n. [Malay.] A native name of the orang-outang. The natives distinguish three kinds, mias pappan, mias-kamur, and mias rombi, which are, however, not scientifically determined to be different from one another. A. R. Wallace.

miaskite, miaskite (mi-as'-kit), n. [< Miash, in Siberia, where the rock is found, + -ite]. In petrog., See chlorite-syenite.

miasma (mī'zma), n. [< F. miasme = Sp. Pg. It. miasma, < NL. miasma, < (Gr. μίαιμα, stain, pollution (cf. μίαινω, stain), < μίανω, stain, dye, taint, pollute).] Same as miasma.

The plague is a malignant fever, caused through pestilential miasma insinuating into the humoral and consistent parts of the body.
 Harvey, Consumptions.

miasma (mī-az'mā), s.; pl. miasmata (-mā-tā). [NL.: see miasm.] The emanations or effluvia arising from the ground and floating in the atmosphere, considered to be infectious or otherwise injurious to health; noxious emanations; malaria. Also called aerial poison.

miasmal (mī-az'māl), a. [< miasm + -al.] Containing miasma; miasmatic: as, miasmal swamps.

miasmatic (mī-az-mat'ik), a. [= F. miasmatique = Sp. miasmático = Pg. It. miasmatico, < NL. miasma(-t-); see miasm.] Pertaining to or of the nature of miasma; affected, caused by, or arising from noxious effluvia; malarious; as, miasmatic exhalations; miasmatic diseases; a miasmatic region.—Miasmatic fever. See fever.

miasmatical (mī-az-mat'ik-āl), a. [< miasmatic + -al.] Same as miasmatic.

miasmatist (mī-az'mat'ist), n. [< miasma(-t-) + -ist.] One who is versed in the phenomena and nature of noxious exhalations; one who makes a special study of diseases arising from miasmata.

miasmatus (mī-az'māt-us), a. [< miasma(-t-) + -ous.] Generating miasma: as, stagnant and miasmatus pools.

miasmology (mī-az-mol'ō-jī), n. [< (Gr. μίαιμα (see miasm) + -λογία, < λόγος, speak; see -ology).] A treatise on miasma; the science that treats of miasmata. Imp. Indt.

miasmous (mī-az'mus), a. [< miasma + -ous.] Miasmal; miasmatic.

The marenma, where swamps and woods cover cities and fields, and some herds of wild cattle and their half savage keepers are the only occupants of a fertile but miasmous desert.
 J. P. Mahaffy, Harper's Mag., LXVIII. 602.

Miastor (mī-as'tor), n. [NL., < (Gr. μίστρον, a guilty wretch, also an avenger, < μίστρον, stain, defile, pass. intransitive; see miasm.)] A remarkable genus of nemocerous dipterous insects of the family Cecidomyiidae, having moniliform eleven-jointed antennae, short two-jointed palpi, and the wings with three veins, the middle one of which does not reach the apex. M. metrolas is an example. This species reproduces aegally. The larvae, which are found under bark, develop within themselves other similar larvae, which again reproduce themselves, until this chain of asexual reproduction ends by the passing of the larva to the pupa state, from which sexual individuals arise to pair and lay eggs for a fresh generation in the usual way. Meinert, 1864.

miau, miaw (miou, miā), v. i. Variant forms of meow. Minchen.

miawl (mi-āl'), v. i. [= F. miauler; see meul.] To cry as a cat; meow.

I mind a squalling woman no more than a miauling kitten.
 Scott.

There was a cat trying to get at the pigeons in the coop. It clawed and miauled at the fatter work of lath.
 Howells, Annie Kilburn, xlix.

mica¹ (mī'kiā), n. [= OF. (and F.) mic = It. mica, < L. mica, a crumb, grain, little bit. Hence nit. miche³ and mic; see mic.] A crumb; a little bit. E. Phillips, 1706.

mica² (mī'kiā), n. [= F. mica = Sp. Pg. mica, a mineral, < NL. mica, a glittering mineral (see def.), < L. mica, a crumb (cf. mica¹), prob. applied to the mineral on the supposition that it was related to L. micare, shine, glitter.] 1. One of a group of minerals all of which are characterized by their very perfect basal cleavage, in consequence of which they can be separated easily into extremely thin, tough, and usually elastic laminae. They occur in crystals with a prismatic angle of 120°, but more commonly in crystalline aggregates, often of large plates, but sometimes of minute scales having a foliated structure, the folia being generally parallel but also, conchoidal, wavy, and interwoven, and also arranged in stellate or plumose and sometimes almost fibrous forms. In crystallization the mica belong to the monoclinic system, but they approximate very closely in form in part to the orthorhombic system (e. g., biotite), in part to the rhombohedral system (e. g., chlorite). The mica are silicates of aluminum with other bases, as iron, calcium, magnesium, potassium, sodium, lithium; in some kinds fluorine is present in small amount. The prominent varieties are—micaceous or common potash mica, the light-colored mica of granite and small rocks, and paragonite, which is an analogous soda species; biotite, or magnesian mica (including muscovite and annite) distinguished according to the position of the optic axial planes, the black or dark-green mica of granite, hornblende rocks, etc.; phlogopite, the bronze-colored species common in crystalline limestone and serpentine rocks; lepidomelane, a black mica containing a large amount of iron; and lepidobiotite, the rose-red or blue lithia mica occurring commonly in aggregates of scales. (See further under these names.) The mica enter into the composition of many rocks, including the crystalline rocks, both metamorphic and volcanic (as granite, gneiss, mica schist, trachyte, diorite, etc.), and sedimentary rocks (as shales and sandstones), sometimes giving them a laminated structure. In the sedimentary rocks they are in most cases derived from the disintegration of older crystalline rocks. Mica (muscovite) is often used in thin transparent plates for spectacles to protect the eyes in various mechanical processes, in reflectors, instead of glass in places exposed to heat, as in head-lights and stove- and lantern-lights, and even for windows in kumia (hence called hucopy glass). Ground to powder, it is combined with varnish to make a glittering coating for wall-papers, and is used also in preparing a covering for roofs, and as a packing and lubricator for machinery. It is often vulgarly called winning. The so-called brittle mica include a number of species, as margarite, serpentine (clintonite), etc., which are related to the true mica, but are characterized by their brittle folia. 2. In the preparation of kaolin for use in the manufacture of porcelain, one of the second set of channels through which a mixture of water and suspended clay washed out by the water from the broken clay-bearing rock is slowly passed to obtain the deposition of flakes of mica and other foreign substances, and thus to purify the clay, which is finally allowed to subside in a series of pits or tanks. Each of the first set of channels through which the mixture is passed for the settling of the coarser flakes of mica, etc., is called a drag. This set of channels is collectively called the drags, and the second set the micas. See porcelain and kaolin.—Copper mica. Same as chalcopyllite.—Lithia mica. Same as lepidobiotite.—Mica-powder, giant-powder in which mica in fine scales takes the place of the silicious earth. Eisler, Mod. High Explosives, p. 33.

mica-. A prefix frequently used in lithology when the rock in question contains more or less mica in addition to the other usual constituents. Thus, mica-syenite, a rock differing very little from ordinary syenite; mica-trap, nearly the same as minette, etc.

micaceous (mī-kā'shius), a. [= F. micacé = Sp. micáceo = Pg. It. micaceo, < NL. "micaceous, < mica, mica; see mica².] 1. Pertaining to or containing mica; resembling mica or partaking of its properties, especially that of occurring in foliated masses consisting of separable laminae: as, micaceous structure.—2. Figuratively, sparkling. Darwin. [Rare.]

There is the Cyclopean stile of which Johnson is the great example, the sparkling or micaceous possessed by Hazlitt.
 Southey, The Doctor, Interchapter xxii.

Micaceous iron ore. See iron. Micaceous rocks, rocks of which mica is the chief ingredient, as mica-slate and clay-slate.—Micaceous schist, mica schist.

Micaria (mī-kā'ri-ā), n. Same as Macaria.

mica-schist (mī'kī-shist'), n. A rock made up of quartz and mica, with a more or less schistose or slaty structure. The relative proportion of the two minerals differs often very considerably even in the same mass of rock. The usual mica in a typical mica-schist is the species called muscovite; this, however, is sometimes replaced to a certain extent by biotite or paragonite. Mica-schist passes readily into talc schist and chlorite-schist; and when feldspar is added to the other constituents of the rock it becomes gneiss. It is one of the most abundantly distributed of the so-called crystalline or metamorphic rocks, and, with granite, gneiss, and the other members of the schist family, forms the main body of the rocks formerly designated as primitives.

mica-slate (mī'kī-slat'), n. The common name of the rock now usually designated by lithologists as mica-schist.

mice, n. Plural of mouse.

mice-eyed (mīs'id), a. Keen-eyed; sharp-sighted.

A legion of mice-eyed decepters.
 Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 177). (Darwin.)

micella (mī-sel'ā), s.; pl. micellæ (-cē). [NL., dim. of L. mica, a crumb, grain; see mica¹.] One of the hypothetical crystalline bodies or plates supposed by Nägeli to be the units out of which organized bodies, more particularly plants, are built up. These micellæ were supposed to be aggregates of larger or smaller numbers of chemical molecules, and were determined by the optical properties exhibited by cell-walls, starch-grains, and various proteid crystalloids. From their optical properties it was concluded further that they were biaxial crystals, and they were assigned, as a probable form, that of parallelepipedal prisms with rectangular or rhomboid bases.

Crystalline doubly refracting particles or micellæ, each consisting of numerous atoms and impermeable by water.
 Eneye Brit., XII. 12.

micellar (mī-sel'ār), a. [< micella + -ar.] Pertaining or relating to micellæ.

Nägeli's micellar hypothesis. Science, VIII. 371.

Mieh. An abbreviation of Michaelmas.

michaelite (mī'kel-īt), n. [< Michael (St. Michael), an island of the Azores, where it is found + -ite.] In mineral., a white, pearly, fibrous variety of opal.

Michaelmas (mī'kel-mas), s. [< ME. Michælmesse, Mychelmesse, Michelmas, Michaelmas, Mychelmasse, < Michel (F. Michel, < Heb. Mikhael, a proper name, signifying 'who is like God').]

Michaelmas (mī-kəl-mas; see mas). 1. A festival celebrated by the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican, and some other churches on September 29th, in honor of the archangel Michael. The festival is called in full the Festival or Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. It appears to have originated in a local celebration or celebration, and seems to have already existed in the fifth century. The Greek Church dedicates November 8th to St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and All Angels; the Armenian and Coptic churches also observe this day.

For lordes and lordles luthere and goode,
For Mykel-masse to Mykel-masse luh fynde mete and drynke.
Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 216.

2. September the 29th as one of the four quarter-days in England on which rents are paid.

And when the tenants come to pay their quarter's rent,
They bring some fowl at Midsummer, a dish of fish in Lent,
At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose.
Gosse (1875), quoted in Chambers's Book of Days, [II. 300.]

All this, though perchance you read it not till Michaelmas, was told you at Micham, 15th August, 1807.
Donne, Letters, x.

Michaelmas daisy. See daisy. Michaelmas head-curt. See head-curt. Michaelmas moon, the harvest moon. Jamieson, [Scotch.]

Michaelsonite (mīk'el-sōn-it), n. [Named after C. A. Michaelson, a Swedish chemist.] In mineral, a rare mineral found in the zircosyenite of Norway; it is related to allanite.

miche (mīch), v. i. [Formerly also mych, myche; also mech, mech, and mouch, mouch; < ME. michen, moochen, mouchen, < OF. michier, mucier, musier, mucier, mucier, F. musier, hide, conceal oneself, skulk.] 1. To shrink from view; lie hidden; skulk; sneak.

Struggle up and down the country, or miche in corners amongst their friends idly, as Carrogus, Bardes, Jesters.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

You, sir, that are miche about my golden mines here,
Chapman, Mask of Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn.
I never look'd for better of that rascal
Since he came miche first into our house.
Hegwood, Woman Killed with Kindness.

2. To be guilty of anything sly, skulking, or mean, such as carrying on an illicit amour, or pilfering in a sneaking way. See micher.

What made the gods so often to trewant from Heaven,
And mych here on earth, but beauty?
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 279.

miche², a. and n. A Middle English form of muck.

miche³, n. See miche.

miche⁴, a. and n. See mickle.

Michelangelo (mī-kel-an-jel-esk'), a. [< Michelangelo (see def.) + -esque.] Pertaining to Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475-1564), a famous Italian sculptor, painter, and architect; resembling the style of Michelangelo, or belonging to his school.

Michelangelism (mī-kel-an-jel-izm), n. [< Michelangelo (see def.) + -ism.] The manner or tendencies in art of Michelangelo Buonarroti. See Michelangelosque.

It shuns the Scylla of nullity and had taste only to fall into the Charybdis of Michelangelism.
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 350.

Michelia (mī-kē'li-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), named after Micheli, a Florentine botanist of the early part of the 18th century.] A genus of plants of the natural order Magnoliaceae and the tribe Magnolieae, characterized by introrse anthers, by having the cluster of pistils raised on a stalk, and by the many-seeded carpels. They are trees having much the appearance of magnolias, but with the flowers usually smaller and (with one exception) axillary, whereas magnolia-flowers are terminal. About 12 species are known, natives of tropical and mountainous Asia. The most noteworthy species are M. eximia, the champ, and M. Champaca, the champak, both valuable economically, the latter a sacred tree in India. See champ and champak.

micelle (mī-shel-lev'i-it), n. [Named after M. Michel Lévy, a French mineralogist.] A mineral having the composition of barite, barium sulphate, and probably that species, but believed by the describer to belong to the monoclinic system. It is found in a massive cleavable form occurring in a crystalline limestone near Perkins Mill, Tempe, Province of Quebec, Canada.

miche¹, n. [Also mecher, meacher; < ME. mycher, mecher; < michel + -er.] One who skulks or sneaks; a truant; a mean thief.

Chyd, be thou lyer nother no theffe;
Be thou no mecher for myscheffe.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 401.

Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a mecher, and eat blackberries?
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., II. 4. 450.

miche² (mīch'ē-ā), n. [< ME. miche, < OF. miche, < michier, mucier, etc., hide, skulk; see miche.] Theft; pilfering; cheating.

Nowe thou shalt full sore abole
That like stelloe of miche.

Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

micching (mīch'ing), n. [Also meeching, meaching; < ME. mychinge; verbal n. of michel, v.] The act of skulking or sneaking; the act of pilfering or cheating.

For no man of his counsaile knoweth
What he male gette of his mychinge.

Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

Op. What means this, my lord?
Ham. Marry, this is micching mallecho; it means mischief.
Shak., Hamlet, III. 2. 146.

We never, in our whole school course, once played truant; but other boys did, and the process was freely talked of among us. We called it micching, pronouncing the i in micch long, as in mille.
P. H. Gosse, Longman's Mag.

micching (mīch'ing), p. a. [Also meeching, meaching; ppr. of michel, v.] Skulking; sneaking; dodging; pilfering; mean.

Sure she has some meeching rasel in her house
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, IV. 1.

A cat . . . grown fat
With eating many a micching mouse.
Herriek, His Grange, or Private Wealth.

But I shn't o' the meechin' klund, thet sets an' thinks for weeks
The bottom's out o' th' universe coz their own gillpot leaks.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 'd ser., p. 13.

"How came the ship to run up a tailor's bill?" "Why, them's mine," said the cap'n, very meeching.
S. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 159.

micken (mīk'en), n. [Origin obscure.] The herb spignel; also called Highland micken. See Menn². [Scotch.]

mickle (mīk'l), a. and n. [I. a. Also dial. muckle, mickle; < ME. mikel, mekel, mukel, mykel (also assimilated michel, mechel, muchel, mochel, > ult. F. much, < AS. mucel, mycel = OS. mukil = OHG. mukil, MLG. michel = OHG. michel, mukil, MHG. michel = Icel. mikill, mykill = Goth. mukils, grent, = Gr. μύς (mú-s), grent, akin to L. magnus, grent (OH. majus, grent), compar. major; see may², magnitude, etc., major, major, etc. II. n. < ME. mikel, etc., mochel, etc.; partly (in sense of 'size') < AS. michlu*, mychlu, size (= OHG. michlu, greatness, size, = Goth. mildel, greatness), < michel, myel, grent; and partly the adj. used as a noun; see I. Mickle is a more orig. form, now obs. or dial., of the word which by assimilation and loss of the final syllable has become muck; see muck.] I. a. 1. Grent; large.

A merryfull maker, full mekill as the night.
York Plays, p. 8.

He has tane up a mickle stone.
And hang 's as far as I cold see.
The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

O mickle is the powerful grace that lies
In herbs, plants, stones, and their true qualities.
Shak., R. and J., II. 3. 15.

2. Much; abundant.

O cruel! Roy, alas, how mickle gail Thy haufull shaft undrags the Moll withall!
Sydney, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Magnificence.

There was never one mickle siller clinked in his purse either before or since.
Scott, Waverley, XVII.

Let me laugh while I've mickle time to grieve
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, xlv.

II. n. 14. Size; magnitude; bigness.
A wonder wel farynge knyght,
Of good mochel, and right yonge thoerto
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 454.

2. A great deal; a large quantity; as, many lilles make a mickle.

mickle, v. t. [< ME. miklen, muchen, muchen, also assimilated muchel, < AS. mucian, mucian, mucian, also mucelian (= OHG. mukilun = Icel. mikla = Goth. mikiljan), become grent, make grent, magnify, < michel, grent; see mickle, a. Cf. muck, v.] To magnify.

mickleness (mīk'l-ness), n. [< ME. mickleness, < AS. mucelnes, mycelnes, < michel, grent; see mickle and -ness.] Bigness; great size.

After this ther com upon thame thame a grette multitude of wyne, that was alle of a wonderfull mickleness, with taskes of a cubit lenth.
MS. Lincoln A. 17.1.20. (Halliwell.)

micky (mīk'i), n.; pl. mickies (-iz). [A dim. of Mike, a familiar abbreviation of Michael, a favorite name among Irishmen, from that of St. Michael. Cf. Pat, Paddy, similarly derived from the name of St. Patrick.] 1. An Irish boy. [Slang, U. S.]—2. A young wild bull. [Australian.]

There were two or three Mickies and wild heifers, who determined to have their owner's heart's blood.
A. C. Grant, Bush-life in Queensland, I. 227.

mico (mē'kō), n. [S. Amer.] 1. A small squirrel-like monkey of South America, one of the marmosets or oestitis, of the genus Hapale or Jaechus. H. argentatus is white, with black tail and flesh-colored face and hands.—2. [cap.] A genus of marmosets based on this species.

Miconia (mī-kō'ni-ā), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1798), named after D. Micon, a Spanish botanist.] A large genus of South American plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and type of the tribe Miconieae. It is characterized by terminal inflorescence, 4- or 5-parted flowers with obtuse petals, and a calyx which has a cylindrical tube and usually a 4- to 8-lobed limb. They are trees or shrubs, with very variable foliage, and white, rose-colored, purple, or yellowish flowers, which are small, and grow in terminal or very rarely lateral clusters. About 400 species have been enumerated, all confined to tropical America. Quite a number are cultivated for ornament. They sometimes receive the name of West Indian currant-bush.

Miconia (mī-kō'ni-ā), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), < Miconia + -ae.] A tribe of New World plants, belonging to the natural order Melastomaceae, typified by the genus Miconia. It is characterized by a berry-like or coriaceous fruit, which breaks open irregularly, by the leaves not being grooved between the primary nerves; and by the anthers opening by one or two pores or slits, with the connective usually having no appendages. The tribe includes 25 genera and nearly 1,000 species, all of which are indigenous to tropical America.

micostalis (mī-kōs-tā'lis), n.; pl. micostales (-lēz). [NL. (Wilder and Gage), < F. micostalis (Straus-Durchein), supposed to stand for microcostalis, < Gr. μικρος, small, + L. costa, rib; see costal.] A muscle of the fore leg of some animals, as the cat, corresponding to the human teres minor.

micrand (mīk-ran'dér), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ανδρ (andros), male.] A dwarf male plant produced by certain coniferous algae. The andropores, which are peculiar zoospores produced non-sexually in special cells of the parent plant, fix themselves (after swimming) upon the female plant and produce these very small male plants.

Micrastur (mīk-ras'tér), n. [NL. < Gr. μικρος, small, + L. astur, a species of hawk; see astur.] A genus of hawks of the family Falconidae and subfamily Accipitrinae, established by G. R. Gray in 1841, having the tarsus reticulated behind and the nostrils circular with a central tubercle. It is peculiar to America, the species ranging from southern Mexico to Bolivia and Peru.

Micrathene (mīk-ra-thé'né), n. [NL. < Gr. μικρος, small, + Ἀθήνη, Athens; see Athene.] A genus of Strigidae established by Conen in 1896; the elf-owls. It includes the most diminutive of owls, with small weak bill and a relatively long rounded wings, square tail with brown vertical bars, tail feathers only above, the feet where covered with bristles, and middle toe with claw as long as the tarsus. The type and only species is M. whitfordi, an insectivorous owl of arboreal habits, found in the southwestern United States and parts of Mexico. It is only about six inches long. Also called Microptilus.

micraulic (mīk-rū'lik), a. [< NL. micraulicus, < Gr. μικρος, small, + NL. aula, aula; see aula, 2.] Having the aula small; specifically, of or pertaining to micraulica.

micraulica (mīk-rū'lik-ā), n. pl. [NL.; see micraulic.] Animals whose aula is small and whose cerebral hemispheres are vertically expanded. They are amphibians, dipnoans, reptiles, birds, and mammals. Wilder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

Micrembryae (mīk-rem-brī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1880), < Gr. μικρος, small, + ἐμβρυον, a germ; see embryo.] A series of dicotyledonous apetalous plants. It is characterized by an ovary consisting of a single carpel or of several united or distinct carpels, by the scales being solitary or rarely several in each carpel, and by the seed having copious fleshy or starchy albumen and a very small embryo. It includes 4 orders (Piperaceae, Chloranthaceae, Myrtaceae, and Montiaceae), 30 genera, and nearly 1,300 species.

micrencephalous (mīk-ren-sēf'ū-lus), a. [< Gr. μικρος, small, + ἐνκεφαλος, the brain.] Small-brained; having a small brain.

micristology (mīk-ris-tol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. μικρος, small, + Ε. λογία, the study.] The science which treats of the minutest organic fibers. Thomas Med. Diet.

micro (mī'krō), n. [< micro, as used in Microcoleptera, etc.] In entom., any small insect. Thus, Microcoleptera are small beetles, Microptera are small flies, etc.; and in familiar language, when the meaning is sufficiently determined by the connection, such words are abbreviated to micro. When not so determined micro always means one of the Microlepidoptera.

micro- (usually mī'krō, but also, better, mīk'rō) [L. etc., micro, < Gr. μικρος, also μικρός, small little.] An element of Greek origin, meaning 'small, little'; specifically, in physics, a prefix indicating a unit one millionth part of the unit it is prefixed to; as, microfarad, microhm, etc.

in lithol., indicating that the structure designated is microscopic in character, or that it is so minutely developed as not to be recognized without the help of the microscope, e. g. microgranitic, micropragmatic, microgranulitic. See these words.

micro-audiphone (mī-kro-ā'di-fōn), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. audiphone.] An instrument for reinforcing or augmenting very feeble sounds so as to render them audible.

Microbacterium (mī'kro-bak-tē'ri-um), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + bakterion, a little stick; see bacterium.] In some systems of classification, a tribe or division of Schizomycetes, containing the single genus Bacterium, and characterized by having elliptical or short cylindrical cells.

microbial (mī'kro-bī-əl), a. Same as microbiol.

But now we have antiseptics of the track and careful covering of the wound to guard against microbial invasion.

Medical News, LII, 501.

microbe (mī'kroh), n. [F. microbe (C. Sedillot, 1878) (N.L. microbion), intended to mean 'a small living being,' but according to the formation 'short-lived' (Gr. μικρός, short-lived), < (Gr. μικρός, small, little, + bios, life).] A minute living being not distinguished, primarily, as to its animal or vegetable nature.

The term is most frequently applied to various microscopic plants or their spores (particularly Schizomycetes), and further has come to be almost synonymous with bacterium. Taken in this latter sense, microbes are regarded as essentially polymorphous organisms, adapting themselves to varied conditions of existence, which in turn influence the form taken by them. For this reason their classification has often varied, since their distinction into genera and species does not yet rest on precise data.

Micrococcus of Chicken Cholera.

terium, Vibrio, Spirillum, form-genera under which they are instrumental in the production of fermentation, decay, and many of the infectious diseases affecting man and the lower animals.

microbia, n. Plural of microbion.

microbial (mī-kro'bi-əl), a. [Gr. μικρός (microbion) + -al.] Of or pertaining to microbes; caused by or due to microbes. Also microbiol.

Leptothrix parasitica.

There is a considerable difference found in the microbial richness of the air in different places in the country. Nineteenth Century, XXII, 244.

microbian (mī-kro'bi-ən), a. [Gr. μικρός (microbion) + -an.] Microbial.

His definition of pellagra is therefore this: "a microbial malady, due to a poisoning produced by a pathogenic bacillus." Lancet, No. 3449, p. 707.

microbic (mī-kro'bik), a. [Gr. μικρός + -ic.] Microbial.

The theory of the microbial causation of the disorder. Medical News, LII, 370.

microbicide (mī-kro'bi-sid), n. [N.L. microbion, microbe, + L. -cidus, a killer, < caedere, kill.] A substance that kills microbes.

Sulphur is well known as a powerful microbicide long recommended in pulmonary diseases.

Medical News, L, 300.

microbiological (mī-kro'bi-ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [Gr. μικροβιολογία + -ic.] Of or pertaining to microbiology; as, microbiological research.

Microbiological study of the lochia. Medical News, XLVIII, 141.

microbiologist (mī-kro'bi-ō-lōj'i-ist), n. [Gr. μικροβιολογία + -ist.] One who studies or is skilled in microbiology; one versed in the knowledge of minute organisms, as microbes.

Ideas which are just now very prominent in the minds of microbiologists. Science, V, 73.

microbiology (mī'kro-bi-ō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. Ν.Λ. microbion, microbe, + Gr. λογία, < λέγω, speak; see -ology.] The science of micro-organisms; the study of microbes.

There was great reason for creating in the Faculty of Sciences the chair of microbiology.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII, 341.

microbion (mī-kro'bi-on), n.; pl. microbia (-i-). [N.L.: see microbe.] Same as microbe.

These [reports] . . . by no means demonstrate that the active principle of cholera resides in a microbion, or that the particular microbion has been discovered.

Science, IV, 145.

microcaltrops (mī-kro-kal'trops), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. caltrop.] A sponge-spicule of minute size, having the form of a caltrop. Also microcalthrops. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII, 417.

Microcameræ (mī-kro-kam'ē-rē), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. camera, chamber; see chamber.] 1. A subtribe of choristidan sponges having the chambers small; opposed to Macrocameræ. Leidenfeld, 1886. — 2. A tribe of cerata sponges with small spherical ciliated chambers and opaque ground-substance. Leidenfeld.

microcamerate (mī-kro-kam'ē-rat), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + L. camera, chamber; see chamber.] Having small chambers; specifically, of or pertaining to the Microcameræ, in either sense.

Microcebus (mī-kro-se'bus), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + κεβος, a long-tailed monkey; see Cebus.] A genus of small prosimian quadrupeds of the family Lemuridae and subfamily Galagulina, containing such species as the pygmy lemur, M. smithi, and the mouse-lemur, M. murinus; the dwarf lemurs.

Microcentri (mī-kro-sen'tri), n. pl. [N.L. (Thomson, 1876), < Gr. μικρός, small, + κέντρον, point, spur; see center.] One of two prime sections of the parasitic hymenopterous family Chalcididae, containing the seven subfamilies which have the tarsi three- or four-jointed (usually four-jointed, rarely heteromerous), anterior tibia with a slender short straight spur, and antennæ usually few-jointed. They are nearly all of small size.

Microcephala (mī-kro-sef'ā-lā), n. pl. [N.L., neut. pl. of microcephalus, < (Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed; see microcephalous).] In Latreille's system, the fifth section of brachelytrous pentamerous Coleoptera. They have no evident neck, the head being received in the thorax as far as the eyes; the thorax is trapeziform, widening from before backward; the body is comparatively little elongated, the mandibles are of moderate size; and the elytra often cover more than half of the abdomen. The species live on flowers, fungi, and dung. Also Microcephalus.

microcephalia (mī-kro-sef'ā-lī-ā), n. [N.L., < (Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed; see microcephalous).] Name as microcephaly.

microcephalic (mī-kro-sef'ā-lī-ik or -sef'ā-lī-ik), a. [As microcephalous + -ic.] Having an unusually small cranium. Specifically (a) In craniom., having a cranium smaller than a certain standard. A capacity of 1,350 cubic centimeters is taken by some as the upper limit of microcephaly. (b) In pathol., having a head small through disease or faulty development, producing idiosyncrasy more or less extreme.

microcephalism (mī-kro-sef'ā-lizm), n. [Gr. μικροκεφαλία + -ism.] A microcephalic condition.

microcephalous (mī-kro-sef'ā-lus), a. [= F. microcephale = Fig. microcephalo, < N.L. microcephalus, < (Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed, < μικρός, small, + κεφαλή, head).] Having a small head. Specifically — (a) Having the skull small or imperfectly developed. (b) In zool., of or pertaining to the Microcephala.

Microcephalus (mī-kro-sef'ā-lus), n. [N.L., < (Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed; see microcephalous).] 1. In entom.: (a) A South American genus of caraboid beetles, with about 6 species, having securiform terminal joints of both maxillary and labial palpi. (b) A genus of nemocerous dipterous insects of the family Chironomidae. Fan der Wulp, 1873. — 2. A genus of reptiles. Lesson. — 3. [Gr. μικροκεφαλος.] (a) A microcephalic person. (b) Microcephaly. — 4. [L.] In teratol., a monster with a small, imperfect head or cranium.

microcephaly (mī-kro-sef'ā-lī), n. [Gr. Ν.Λ. μικροκεφαλία, q. v.] The condition or character presented by a small or imperfectly developed head.

Microchæta (mī-kro-kē'tā), n. [N.L., < (Gr. μικρός, small, + χαιτα, a mane; see chæta).] A genus of earthworms. M. ruppelii is a gigantic South African earthworm, four or five feet long, of greenish and reddish coloration. Beddard, 1886.

microcharacter (mī-kro-kar'ak-tēr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + χαρακτήρ, character; see character.] Any zoological character derived from microscopic or other minute examination.

microchemical (mī-kro-kem'i-kal), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, minute, + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to microchemistry; as, microchemical reactions; microchemical experiments; distinguished from macrochemical.

Microchemical examination shows that it performs a complex function.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 339.

microchemically (mī-kro-kem'i-kal-i), adv. By microchemical processes; by means of or in accordance with microchemistry.

microchemistry (mī-kro-kem'i-s-trī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, minute, + E. chemistry.] Minute chemical investigation; chemical analysis or investigation applied to objects under the microscope.

Microchiroptera (mī'kro-kī-rop'tē-rā), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. μικρός, small, + N.L. Chiroptera, q. v.).] A suborder of Chiroptera, including the insectivorous or animalivorous (rarely frugivorous or blood-sucking) bats. They have a simple stomach (except Desmodus); a large Spligellian and generally small caudate lobe of the liver; the tail contained in the interfemoral membrane when present, or freed from its upper surface; the rim of the ear incomplete at the base of the auricle; the index finger rudimentary or wanting and without a claw; the palate not produced back of the molar teeth; and the molar teeth cuspidate. The group includes all bats except the family Pteropodidae (which constitutes the suborder Megachiroptera), inhabiting most parts of the world, and falling into two large series, the vespertilionine alliance and the emballonurine alliance, the former of three families, the latter of two. Antrozous, Eutomopoda, and Insectivora are synonyms of Microchiroptera.

microchiropteran (mī'kro-kī-rop'tē-ran), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Microchiroptera.

II. n. One of the Microchiroptera; any bat except a fruit-bat.

microchiropterous (mī'kro-kī-rop'tē-rus), a. Same as microchiropteran.

microchoanite (mī-kro-kō'ā-nīt), a. and n. [N.L. Microchoanites.] I. a. Having short septal funnels, as a nautiloid; belonging to the Microchoanites.

II. n. A member of the Microchoanites. Microchoanites (mī-kro-kō'ā-nī'tēs), n. pl. [N.L., < (Gr. μικρός, small, + χοάνη, a funnel; see choana, choanite).] A group of ellipsochordoid nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are short. Huytt, Proc. Bot. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1883, p. 230.

Microchronometer (mī'kro-kro-nom'ē-tēr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + χρόνος, time, + μέτρον, measure; see chronometer.] An instrument for registering very small periods of time, such as the time occupied by the passage of a projectile over a short distance; a kind of chronograph. Also called, corruptly, micronometer.

Microciona (mī-kro-sī'ō-nī), n. [N.L., < (Gr. μικρός, small, + κίον (κίον), a pillar).] A genus of fibrosilicious sponges of the division Echinomata. M. prolifera is a common sponge on the Atlantic coast of the United States, growing in tide-pools in sheeted or branched masses of orange-red color.

microclastic (mī-kro-klas'tik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κλαστός, broken, < κλάω, break; see clastic.] An epithet applied to a elastic or fragmentary rock or breccia made up of pieces of small size. Naumann. [Rare.]

microcline (mī'kro-klin), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κλίω, incline; see cline, clinic.] A felspar identical in composition with orthoclase, but belonging to the triclinic system. Thin sections often exhibit a peculiar grating-like structure in polarized light, due to double twinning. Much of the potash felspar called orthoclase is really microcline, and the beautiful green felspar called Amazon stone is here included. See Feldspar and Orthoclase.

Section of Microcline as seen in polarized light.

Micrococcus (mī-kro-kōs'us), n. [N.L., < (Gr. μικρός, small, + κόκος, a berry, kernel; see coccus).] 1. A genus of Schizomycetes (fission-fungi or bacteria), and the only one of the tribe Sphaerobacteria. It is characterized by globular or oval slightby colored cells, either formed by transverse division into filaments of two or several chaplet-like articulations, or united in families, or aggregated in gelatinous masses, all destitute of spontaneous movement but exhibiting a simple molecular tremor. Its species are divided into three physiological groups — chromogenes, producing coloring matter, as in "red milk" (M. prodigiosus, figured under microbe), or "golden yellow" (M. luteus); zymogenes, producing various fermentations, as in animal and vegetable infusions (M. crepusculum) or urine (M. ureæ); and pathogenes, producing diseases. Variola, vacuola, septicaemia, erysipelas, gonorrhoea, and other forms are believed to be produced by micrococci. 2. [L. c.; pl. micrococci (-si).] Any member of this genus.

Micrococcus of Diptheria.

By the specific term micrococcus is understood a minute spherical or slightly oval organism (Spherobacterium, Cohn), that like other bacteria divides by fission (Schizomycetes), and that does not possess any special organ, cilium or flagellum, by using which it would be capable of moving freely about.

E. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Disease, p. 37.

Microcoleoptera (mi-kro-kō-lē-op'tē-rā), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + N.L. Coleoptera, q. v.] In entom., the smaller kinds of beetles collectively considered.

microconidium (mi-kro-kō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. microconidia (-ā). [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + N.L. conidium.] A conidium of small size as compared with others produced in the same species.

Microconidia (of Hypomyces) or conidia proper very copious. Cooke, Handbook Brit. Fungi, p. 770.

microcosm (mi-kro-kōz-m), n. [F. microcosme = Sp. microcosmos = Pg. It. microcosmo, < L.L. microcosmos (Boëthius), < Gk. μικρόκοσμος, a little world, < Gr. μικρός, small, + κόσμος, world.] 1. A little world or cosmos; the world in miniature; something representing or assumed to represent the principle of universality; often applied to man regarded as an epitome, physically and morally, of the universe or great world (the macrocosm).

If you see this in the map of my microcosm, follows it that I am known well enough too? Shak., Cor., II. i. 68.

The ancients not improperly styled him [man] a microcosm, or little world within himself.

Bacon, Physical Fables, II, Expl.

Some told me it [a mountain] was fourteen miles high; it is covered with a very microcosm of cloudes.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 91.

In the dark dissolving human heart
And holy secrets of this microcosm, Babbling a shameless hand with shameful jest

Tennyson, Princess, III.

Each part 'e is a microcosm, and faithfully renders the likeness of the world.

Emerson, Discipline.

2. A little community or society.
And now the hour has come when this youth is to be launched into a world more vast than that in which he has hitherto sojourned, yet for which this microcosm has been no ill preparation.

Diareti.

microcosmic (mi-kro-kōz'mik), a. [= F. microcosmique; as microcosm + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a microcosm or to anything that is regarded as such. — Microcosmic salt, m, NaH₂PO₄ + H₂O, a salt of soda, ammonia, and phosphoric acid, originally obtained from human urine. It is much employed as a flux in experiments with the blowpipe.

microcosmical (mi-kro-kōz'mi-kal), a. [< microcosmic + -al.] Same as microcosmic. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 3. microcosmography (mi-kro-kōz-mog'grā-fī), n. [< Gr. μικροσκοπία, microscopia, + -γραφία, < γραφειν, write, Cf. cosmography.] The description of man as a "little world."

microcosmology (mi-kro-kōz-mol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. μικροσκοπία, microscopia, + -λογία, < λογειν, speak; see -ology.] A treatise on the microcosm, specifically on the human body, or on man.

microcosmos (mi-kro-kōz'mos), n. Same as microcosmus, 1.

microcosmus (mi-kro-kōz'mus), n. [L.L. (in defs. 2 and 3, N.L.), < Gr. μικροκοσμος, a little world; see microcosm.] 1. Same as microcosm, 1.—2. A tunicate, ascidian, or sea-squirt: applied by Linnaeus in 1735, and recently revived by Heller as a generic name.—3. [cap.] A genus of coleopterous insects. (Chaudoir, 1878.

microcoulomb (mi-kro-kō-lom'), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. coulomb.] One millionth of a coulomb. See coulomb.

microcousic (mi-kro-kōs'tik), a. and n. [Irreg. < Gr. μικρός, small, + κοινός, pertaining to hearing: see acoustic.] I. a. Serving to augment weak sounds; of or pertaining to an instrument for augmenting weak sounds.

II. n. An aural instrument designed to collect and augment small sounds, for the purpose of assisting the partially deaf in hearing.

microcrith (mi-kro-krit'h), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σπῆς, barley: see crith.] In chem., the unit of molecular weight, denoting the weight of the half-molecule of hydrogen.

microcrystalline (mi-kro-kris'tā-lin), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κρυστάλλινος, crystalline: see crystalline.] Minutely crystalline: said of crystalline rocks of which the constituents are individually so minute that they cannot be distinguished from each other by the naked eye; cryptocrystalline. Many lithologists use microcrystalline and cryptocrystalline as synonymous. Rosenbusch, however, uses the former term to designate that structure of the ground-mass in which the constituent minerals can, with the aid of the microscope, be specifically determined, and the latter for a structure which can be recognized as crystalline, but in which the individual components cannot be specifically identified.

microcrystallitic (mi-kro-kris'tā-lit'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κρυστάλλινος, crystal, + -ιτικός + -ic.] A term used by Geikie to designate a devitrification product in which this process has been carried so far that little or no glassy base appears, the original glassy substance having become changed into an aggregation of crystallites or "little granules, needles, and hairs." See microfelsitic.

microcyst (mi-kro-sist), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κύστις, the bladder, a bag, pouch.] In Myxomycetes, the resting state of swarm-spores, which become rounded off and invested with a delicate membrane, or sometimes only with a firm border, and may return again under favorable conditions to a state of movement. See Myxomycetes, swarm-spore.

microcyte (mi-kro-sit), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κύτος, a hollow, cavity: see cyle.] 1. A small cell or corpuscle.

The microcytes. Very small bodies, for the most part colourless, freely suspended in the plasma.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 123.

2. A small blood-corpuscle, in size from 2 to 6 micromillimeters, found, often in large numbers, in many cases of anemia.

microcythemia (mi-kro-si-thē-mi-ē), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κύτος, a hollow (see microcyte), + αἷμα, blood.] That condition of the blood in which there are many corpuscles of diminished size.

microcytosis (mi-kro-si-tō'sis), n. Microcythemia.

microdactylous (mi-kro-dak'ti-lus), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + δάκτυλος, finger: see dactyl.] Having short or small fingers or toes.

microdentism (mi-kro-den'tizm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + δεντός, = E. tooth, + -ism.] Smallness of the teeth.

Microdentism—mere smallness of the teeth was chronicled in fourteen of the hundred cases.

Lancet, No. 3432, p. 1152.

micro-detector (mi-kro-dē-tek'tor), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. detector.] A sensitive galvanoscope.

Microdiptera (mi-kro-dip'tē-rā), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + N.L. Diptera.] In entom., the smaller kinds of flies collectively considered.

Microdon (mi-kro-don), n. [N.L. (Meigen, 1803), < Gr. μικρός, small, + δόντις (δόντις) = E. tooth.] 1. In entom., an important genus of syrphid flies, containing a few European and about 20 North American species. They are large, nearly bare, usually short and thick set, with flattened scutellum and short wings, in which there is a stump of a vein in the first posterior cell from the third longitudinal vein. The larvae are remarkable objects, resembling shells, and have twice been described and named as mollusks. M. globosus is an example.

2. In ichth., a genus of psenodont fishes of the Cretaceous period. Agassiz, 1833.—3. In conch., a genus of bivalve mollusks. Conrad, 1842.

microdont (mi-kro-dont), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + δόντις (δόντις) = E. tooth.] Having short or small teeth.

The microdont races are the low caste natives of central and southern India; the Polygnathians, the ancient Egyptians; mixed Europeans not British, and the British.

Science, IV. 539.

micro-electric (mi-kro-elek'trik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. electric.] Having electric properties in a very small degree. — Micro-electric metrology, the measurement of minute electric quantities.

microfarad (mi-kro-far'ad), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. farad.] The practical unit of electrical capacity, equal to the millionth part of a farad. It is the capacity of about three miles of an Atlantic cable.

microfelsite (mi-kro-fel'sit), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. felsite.] In ichthol., a base or ground-mass having a microfelsitic structure. See microfelsitic.

microfelsitic (mi-kro-fel-sit'ik), a. [< microfelsite + -ic.] The designation suggested by Zirkel for a devitrified glass when the devitrification has been carried so far that the hyaline character is lost, but not far enough to give rise to the development of distinctly individualized mineral forms. Other lithologists have used this word with different shades of meaning. Rosenbusch defines it as follows: "This substance, which is distinguished from micro- and crypto-crystalline aggregates by the absence of any action on polarized light, and from what may properly be called glass by not being entirely without structure and by being decidedly less transparent, I call microfelsite or the microfelsitic base."

microfoliation (mi-kro-fō-lī-ā'shon), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. foliation.] Microscopic foliation, or that which is not distinctly recognized by the naked eye; a term used by Bonney in discussing the effect of pressure in Paleozoic sedimentary rocks. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 44.

Microgadus (mi-kro-gā'dus), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + N.L. Gadus, q. v.] A genus of small gadoid fishes, established by Gill in 1865; the tomocods. M. tomcodus is a well known species of the Atlantic coast of the United States. M. proximus is its representative on the Pacific coast.

Microgaster (mi-kro-gas'tēr), n. [N.L. (Latroille, 1804), < Gr. μικρός, small, + γαστήρ, stomach: see gaster.] 1. A notable genus of parasitic hymenoptera of the family Brucidae, giving name to the subfamily Microgasterinae. They are characterized by the three submarginal cells of the fore wings (the second one often incomplete) and by having the hind tibiae spurs more than half the length of the tarsi. Many are known from Europe and North America, as M. subcomptus of the former country, which is parasitic on various lepidopterous larvae.

2. [L. c.] A member of this genus.

Microgasterinae (mi-kro-gas'tē-rī-nē), n. pl. [N.L., < Microgaster + -inae.] A large subfamily of Brucidae, typified by the genus Microgaster, having the mesonotal sutures invisible and the large marginal cell reaching to the end of the wing. There are many species, of 6 genera, the largest one of which, Apanteles, has 60 species in Great Britain alone. Their larvae parasitize many insects, especially lepidopterous larvae, boring from the body of the host and spinning cocoons either singly or in mass. A. glomeratus is an abundant parasite of the cabbage-worm, Pieris rapae, both in Europe and in North America.

microgeological (mi-kro-jē-ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< microgeology + -ic.] Pertaining to microgeology; dependent on or derived from the use of the microscope in relation to geology; as, microgeological investigations.

microgeology (mi-kro-jē-ō-lōj'i), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. geology.] That department of the science of geology whose facts are ascertained by the use of the microscope.

Microglossa (mi-kro-glos'sā), n. [N.L., also Microglossus, Microglossum, < Gr. μικρός, small, + γλῶσσα, the tongue: see glossa.] In ornith., a genus of cockatoos of the family Cacatuidæ, established by Geoffroy in 1800. It contains the great black cockatoo, as M. aterrimus, gambelii, and also, all inhabitants of New Guinea and other islands of the Papuan region.

microglossia (mi-kro-glos'i-ā), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + γλῶσσα, the tongue: see glossa.] Congenital smallness of the tongue.

Microglossidae (mi-kro-glos'i-dē), n. pl. [N.L., < Microglossa + -idae.] A family of psittacine birds, the black cockatoos; synonymous with Cacatuidæ.

Microglossinae (mi-kro-glo-sī-nē), n. pl. [N.L., < Microglossa + -inae.] A subfamily of Cacatuidæ, represented by the genus Microglossa and containing the black cockatoos.

microgonidial (mi-kro-gō-nid'i-āl), a. [< microgonidium + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a microgonidium.

microgonidium (mi'krō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. microgonidia (-ī). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + γόνιον, gonion, a gonidium.] A gonidium of small size as compared with certain others produced by the same species.

The latter form [of Chlorococcum] is said to arise from the former by internal cell-division, which results in the production of "gonidia" of two sizes, the larger being termed macrogonidia, and the smaller microgonidia.
Hewey, Botany, p. 219.

microgram (mi'krō-grām), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + γράμμα, gramma, a letter.] The millionth part of a gram, being about $\frac{1}{100,000}$ of a grain Troy.

microgranite (mi'krō-gran'it), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + Ε. granule.] In petrology. See quartz-porphry.

microgranitic (mi'krō-gran-it'ik), a. [< microgranite + -ic.] Pertaining to microgranite.—
Microgranitic structure. See quartz porphyry.

microgranulitic (mi'krō-gran-ū-lit'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + Ε. granule.] In lithology, an epithet applied by Lévy to a form of granitoid structure which is so finely crystallized that it cannot be recognized by the naked eye, but which, under the microscope, is revealed as being made up of crystalline individuals each having its own independent orientation, so that in polarized light it presents the appearance of a brilliantly colored mosaic. The microgranulitic structure, as this form is used by Lévy, differs from the microgranitic in the crystalline individuals of the latter having all one common orientation.

micrograph (mi'krō-grāf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + γράφω, graphō, write.] Same as microphotograph.

micrographer (mi'krō-grāf'ēr), n. [< micrograph + -er.] One who is versed in micrography.

micrographic (mi'krō-grāf'ik), a. [= F. micrographique; as micrography + -ic.] Of or pertaining to micrography.

micrographist (mi'krō-grāf'ist), n. [< micrograph + -ist.] One who is skilled in micrography; a micrographer.

micrography (mi'krō-grāf'ī), n. [= F. micrographie; as micrograph + -y.] It. micrografia, < Gr. μικρός, small, + γράφω, graphō, write. Cf. Gr. μικρογράφος, 'write small,' i. e. with a short vowel.] The description of objects too small to be discerned without the aid of a microscope.

Microhierax (mi'krō-hī'e-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ἵραξ, hīraks, a hawk, falcon; see Hierax.] A genus of very small hawks of the family Falconidae, established by R. B. Sharpe in 1874; the falconets; the flueh-falcones. It contains the distinctive species usually referred to the genus Hierax, which name is pre-occupied in another department of zoology. The range of the genus includes southern Asia, Java, Borneo, etc. There are several species, as M. everetti, M. frontalis, M. melanoleuca, and erythrogyna.

microhm (mik'rōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + Ε. ohm.] An electrical unit equal to the millionth part of an ohm.

microlepidopter (mi'krō-lep-i-dop'tēr), n. In entomology, an insect of one of the families included in the Microlepidoptera.

Microlepidoptera (mi'krō-lep-i-dop'te-rī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ΝL. Lepidoptera, q. v.] The smaller and more simply organized moths, including, generally, the smaller Pyralidae, the Tortricidae, the Tineidae, and the Pterophoridae. These insects do not constitute a natural division, and the name is merely used for convenience, the other members of the order being distinguished as Macrolepidoptera, or simply as Lepidoptera.

microlepidopteran (mi'krō-lep-i-dop'te-ran), a. and n. I. a. Microlepidopterous.
II. n. A microlepidopter.

microlepidopterist (mi'krō-lep-i-dop'te-ris-t), n. [< Microlepidoptera + -ist.] One who is versed in the natural history of Microlepidoptera.

microlepidopterous (mi'krō-lep-i-dop'te-ris-t), a. [< Microlepidoptera + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the microlepidoptera.

Microlicia (mi'krō-lis'ī-ā), n. [NL. (Don, 1835), so called as having the leaves usually small; < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὅλιος, holios, universal, general, < ὅλος, hōlos.] A genus of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and type of the tribe Melastomaceae, characterized by very unequal stamens with beaked or tube-bearing anthers, the connective elongated at the base, and by the calyx lobes being shorter than the tube. They are erect branching shrubs usually not more than a foot or two high with small leaves, which are generally glaucous-dotted and solitary, commonly rose-purple or white flowers, which are axillary or sometimes terminal. There are about six species, natives of Brazil, Guiana, and Peru. A few are sometimes found in greenhouses.

Microlicia (mi'krō-lis'ī-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Triana, 1871), < Microlicia + -ia.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and the suborder Melastomaceae, characterized by the cylindrical or angular capsule, conical or convex at the apex, by the connective often being produced below the anther-cells, and by oblong or ovoid seeds. The tribe embraces 15 genera, Microlicia being the type, and about 250 species, all of which are found in tropical America.

microlite (mi'krō-lit), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, lithos, a stone; see -lite.] 1. A mineral related to pyrochlore, occurring in regular octahedrons having a brownish color and a resinous luster. It is essentially a niobate of calcium. It was first found at Chesterfield in Massachusetts in minute crystals (whence the name), later in Virginia in larger crystals sometimes weighing several pounds.
2. Same as microlith; an incorrect use.

microliter (mi'krō-lē'tēr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + Ε. liter.] The millionth part of a liter.

microlith (mi'krō-lith), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, lithos, a stone.] A name proposed by Vogelsang, in 1867, to designate the "microscopic acicular components of rocks"; a "microscopic individual" (Zirkel). The usage of later lithologists differs considerably in the application of this term. By some it is regarded as the equivalent of crystallite, which is properly an aggregation of microscopic globular forms (globulites). By others crystallites are considered as differing from microliths in that the latter have the internal structure of true crystals while in the former this cannot be recognized. Elongated or lath-shaped forms and such as resemble an hour glass in shape are those now most generally designated as microliths; if curved or more or less twisted or hair like, they are frequently called trachites. Microliths are most frequently seen in rocks of igneous origin, and are especially abundant as products of the devitrification of the glassy lavas. The feldspars, hornblende, augite, and apatite are minerals most commonly found assuming this form.

microlithic (mi'krō-lith'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, lithos, a stone, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to or consisting of small stones; opposed to megalthic.

The cognate examples in the microlithic styles afford us very little assistance.

J. Ferguson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 47.
2. In lithology, pertaining to or characterized by microliths.

microlitic (mi'krō-lit'ik), a. [< microlite + -ic.] Same as microlithic.

micrological (mi'krō-lōj'ik), a. [< micrology + -ic.] Characterized by minuteness of investigation.

Of that equanimity, circumspection, patience of research, intellectual discipline, and equipment of micrological scholarship, without which it is given to no man to be a philologist, he has unhappily made the most pernicious provision.
F. Hall, Mod. Lang., p. 3-0.

micrologically (mi'krō-lōj'ik-ly), adv. In a micrological manner; by means of exact attention to minute details.

If things are to be scanned so micrologically.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 27, note.

micrology (mi'krō-lōj'ī), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λόγος, logos, a word; see -ology.] Cf. micrology.] That part of science which is dependent on microscopic investigations; micrography.

micrology (mi'krō-lōj'ī), n. [< Gr. μικρολογία, the quality of being careful about trifles, < μικρός, small, + λόγος, logos, a word; see -ology.] Cf. micrology.] Undue attention to minute, unimportant matters; minute erudition.

There is less micrology in his erudition.
Roberts, W. Taylor II, 146, (Darius.)

Micromastictora (mi'krō-mas-tik'tō-rī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + μάστιξ, mastix, a scourger, < μάστιγος, mastigos, whip, scourge, < μάστιξ, mastix, a whip, scourge.] In Solas's classification of sponges, one of two main branches of the phylum Parazoa or Spongia, characterized by the comparatively small size of the choanocytes, which are about 0.003 millimeter in diameter. The Micromastictora are all non-clerous sponges, and are divided by Solas into two classes, Micromastictora and Scleromastictora. They are also called Nonclerous (Verrill) and Plethyspongia (Sollas). The term is contrasted with Macromastictora.

micromelus (mi'krō-mē-lus), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + μέλος, melos, a limb; see -melus.] In teratology, a monster with abnormally small limbs.

micromeral (mi'krō-mē-ral), a. [< micromere + -al.] Of or pertaining to a micromere; as, micromeral blastomeres.

micromere (mi'krō-mē-rē), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + μέρος, meros, a part.] The smaller one of two masses or moieties into which the vitellus of a lamellibranch, as a fresh-water mussel, divides; the so-called "animal cell" of Rabi, which further subdivides into blastomeres. See macromere.

The segmentation resembles that of other mollusks, the micromeres appearing at the formative pole by separation of the "protoplasmic" portion of the "macromeres."
Roy, Micro. Soc. Jour., 2d ser., VI. 2. 224.

Micromeria (mi'krō-mē'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Benthams), < Gr. μικρός, small, + μέρος, meros, a part.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Satureieae and the subtribe Melisseae. The calyx is tubular, commonly thirteen-nerved, and about equally five-toothed. The corolla is short, rarely exerted from the calyx, bilabiate, the upper lip erect, flatish, entire, or emarginate, the lower spreading and three-parted. The filaments are arcuate ascending, the anterior pair longer; the anthers are two celled. The flowers are borne in whorls, axillary or crowded into a spike, or are sometimes single or cymose in the opposite axils. The species, numbering about 60, are low herbs or somewhat shrubby plants, sweet-odorous, of various habit, distributed pretty widely in the Old World, with a few in South America and the West Indies, and two or three in the United States. M. Douglasii is a well-known sweet-scented herb of California called yerba buena. M. oborata of the West Indies has been called allheal.

micromeric (mi'krō-mē'rik), a. [< micromere + -ic.] Same as micromeral.

micromeritic (mi'krō-mē-ris'ik), a. [< μικρός, small, + μέρος, meros, a part.] A term suggested by Vogelsang to designate a granitoid or thoroughly crystalline texture of a rock so fine as to be recognizable only with the aid of the microscope.

micrometer (mi'krō-mē'tēr), n. [= F. micromètre; as Sp. micrómetro; as Fr. micromètre, < Gr. μικρός, small, + μέτρον, metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring microscopic lengths and angles. All micrometers depend upon two principles, magnification and oblique measurement. Magnification determines an angle by measuring the arc that subtends it upon a circle of large fixed radius, having its center coincident with the vertex of the angle. Thus, a mirror turning through a small angle may reflect a spot of light upon a distant scale. Oblique measurement (see diagonal scale, under diagonal) ascertains a length by measuring the distance at which it subtends a small fixed angle. Thus, the wedge micrometer is a long wedge-shaped piece of metal or glass with its sloping sides as truly plane as possible and graduated along its length. It is used to measure the distance between two points having a rigid circuitous connection, but a vacant space about the line between them. The wedge being thrust between the points, the distance it penetrates shows how far apart they are. The principle of oblique measurement is, in nearly all micrometers, applied under the form of a fine screw, the number of whose revolutions and parts of a revolution, in advancing from one point to another, measures the amount of this advance. In this case the pitch of the screw is the fixed angle, while the reading of the screw head is proportional to the variable radius at which this angle is subtended by the length to be measured.

Annular or circular micrometer. A micrometer consisting, in its most approved form, of a disk of parallel plate glass, having in its center a round hole to the edges of which a ring of metal is cemented and afterward truly turned in a lathe. The disk being mounted in a brass tube, so that it may be accurately adjusted in the focus of the eyepiece and applied to a telescope, the metal ring is alone visible, and appears as if suspended in the atmosphere, whence the instrument is called the suspended annular micrometer. Brande and Cox, Dict., II. 546 (changed). Double-image micrometer. A micrometer having an optical apparatus which produces two images of every object, as A and A', B and B'. Then, A may be brought into coincidence with B, or B may be brought into coincidence with A, and the position of the parts producing the double image will then show the distance between A and B. Filar micrometer. A micrometer in which the two objects whose distance is to be measured are brought into coincidence with two spider-lines in the principal focus of a telescope or microscope, one of these webs being movable by turning a micrometer-screw. The astronomical filar micrometer is also provided with a graduated position circle, apparatus for illumination, etc. Micrometer-balance. A form of balance adapted to the exact determination of very small weights or differences in weight. That devised by Kershaw for testing the weight of gold pieces consists of a steady support on a knife-edged fulcrum and geared with a wheel graduated to half-grains. If the coin is of correct weight, the index points to zero. If it is light, the leverage of the beam turns the wheel until equilibrium is attained, when the index-bar points to the number of half-grains of shortage. F. H. Knight Mother-of-pearl micrometer. Cavallo's micrometer, which consists of a thin semitransparent piece of mother of pearl, 2. of an inch wide, having fine graduations. It is mounted within the tube at the focus of the eye-lens of the telescope, where the image of the object under observation is produced.

micrometer-screw (mi'krō-mē'tēr-skro), n. A screw attached to optical and mathematical instruments as a means of measuring very small angles. The pitch of the screw is made exceedingly small, while the graduated head is large, thus securing great exactness and simplicity in use.

micrometric (mi'krō-mē't'rik), a. [= F. micrométrique; as micrometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the micrometer; made by the micrometer; as, micrometric measurements.

micrometrical (mi'krō-mē't'rik-al), a. [< micrometric + -al.] Same as micrometric.

micrometrically (mi'krō-mē't'rik-al-ly), adv. By means of a micrometer.

micrometry (mi-krom'et-ri), n. [= F. micrometrie; as micrometer + -y.] The art of measuring small objects or distances with a micrometer.

micromillimeter, micromillimetre (mi-kro-mil'i-mé-tér), n. [< Gr. mikros, small, + E. millimeter.] 1. The millionth part of a millimeter. — 2. The thousandth part of a millimeter: formerly and sometimes still used by biologists. The equivalent used by metrologists and physicists is micron.

micromineralogical (mi'kró-min'e-ra-loj'i-kal), a. [< micromineralogy + -ic-al.] Pertaining to micromineralogy.

Rocks may occur the structure of which . . . has been yet more obscured by subsequent micromineralogical change. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV, 42.

micromineralogy (mi'kró-min-e-ra-l'ô-jí), n. [< Gr. mikros, small, + E. mineralogy.] That part of mineralogy which has to do with the study of the optical, chemical, or other characters of minerals by means of the microscope, as they are observed, for example, in thin sections of rocks.

micron (mi'krou), n. [NL., < Gr. mikros, neut. of mikros, also μικρός, small, minute.] The millionth part of a meter, or $\frac{1}{1,000,000}$ of an English inch. This term has been formally adopted by the International Commission of Weights and Measures, representing the civilized nations of the world, and is adopted by all metrologists. The quantity is denoted by the Greek letter μ written above the line: as, 25^{μ} . 4.

Micronesian (mi'kró-né-si-an), a. and n. [< Micronesia (< Gr. μικρονησία, a small island, < mikros, small, + νῆσος, an island: see def.) + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Micronesia, a collection of islands and groups of islands, chiefly of coral formation, in the Pacific ocean, the principal of which are the Marshall, Gilbert, Caroline, and Ladrone groups.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Micronesia.

micronometer (mi'kró-nom'e-tér), n. A corrupt form of microchronometer.

micronucleus (mi'kró-nu'klé-us), n.: pl. micronuclei (-i). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. nucleus, q. v.] A small nucleus: distinguished from macronucleus.

The micronucleus is a hermaphrodite sexual element, of sole importance in conjugation. Amer. Nat., XXII, 235.

micronymy (mi'kró-ni-mí), n. [< Gr. μικρόνυμα, < μικρός, small, + ὄνυμα, ónuma, name.] The use of short easy words instead of long hard ones.

Astronomers have set an example in micronymy that anatomists might well follow.

Book's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 329.

micro-organic (mi'kró-ôr-gan'ik), a. [< Gr. mikros, small, + E. organic, after micro-organism.] Having the character of a micro-organism: of or pertaining to microbes and other micro-organisms; microbial.

micro-organism (mi'kró-ôr-gan-izm), n. [< Gr. mikros, small, + E. organism.] A microscopic organism, as a bacillus, bacterium, or vibrio; a microbe; a microzoary.

The microorganisms of the principal infectious diseases of man and the lower animals. Amer. Nat., XXIII, 56.

Micropalama (mi'kró-pal'a-ni), n. [NL., < Gr. mikros, small, + παλάμη, the palm of the hand: see palm.] A genus of Scalopoda established by S. F. Baird in 1858: so called from the microparasite (mi'kró-par'a-sít), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. parasite.] A parasitic micro-organism.

The number of substances which are less injurious to man than to micro-parasites is very small.

Science, III, 130.

microparasitic (mi'kró-par-a-sít'ik), a. [< microparasite + -ic.] Having the character of or pertaining to microparasites; caused by microparasites: as, microparasitic diseases.

micropathological (mi'kró-path-ô-loj'i-kal), a. [< micropathology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to micropathology: as, micropathological investigation.

micropathologist (mi'kró-pa-thol'ô-jist), n. [< micropathology + -ist.] One who treats of or is versed in micropathology.

micropathology (mi'kró-pa-thol'ô-jí), n. [< Gr. mikros, small, + E. pathology.] 1. The scientific study of micro-organisms in their relations to disease. — 2. Morbid histology.

micropegmatite (mi'kró-peg'ma-tít), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pegmatite.] A rock having a micropegmatitic structure.

micropegmatitic (mi'kró-peg'ma-tít'ik), a. [< micropegmatite + -ic.] Having the structure of graphic granite, but in a microscopic rather than macroscopic form. See pegmatite and microgranulite.

microperthitic (mi'kró-pér-thít'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. perthite + -ic.] Exhibiting, under the microscope, the structure of perthite — that is, an interlamination of orthoclase (or microcline) and albite. Nature, XXXVII, 459.

microphagist (mi'kró-fá-jist), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + φαγῖν, eat, + -ist.] An eater of microscopic objects; an animal that feeds upon organisms of microscopic size.

Several species (of diatoms) . . . have been supplied in abundance by the careful dissection of the above microphagists. W. B. Carpenter, Micros (Phila. ed., 1856), p. 303.

microphone (mi'kró-fôn), n. [= F. microphone = Sp. microfono, < Gr. μικρός, small, + φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument for augmenting small sounds. The instrument invented for this purpose by Mr. Hughes in 1875 is based on the fact that when substances possessing little electrical conductivity are placed in the course of an electric current, the conductivity of the system is much increased by even the very smallest amount of pressure. The instrument has various forms, but in most of them one piece of charcoal is held loosely between two other pieces in such a manner as to be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it by the air or by any other medium. The two external pieces are placed in connection with a telephone, and when the ear is placed at the ear-piece of the telephone the sounds caused by a fly walking on the wooden support of the microphone appear as loud as the tramp of a horse. By suitable arrangements the sounds of the human voice conveyed from a distance by the telephone can be made audible in every part of a hall. Microphone relay, a delicate microphone mounted on or connected with the membrane of the receiving telephone, as a relay. See relay.

microphonic (mi'kró-fôn'ik), a. [As microphone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or obtained by means of the microphone: serving to intensify small or weak sounds; microacoustic. Also microphonous.

A large induction coil is essential in connection with the transmitter when this receiver is used, and any microphonic transmitter will answer. T. B. Lockwood, Elect., Mag., and Telegr., p. 315.

microphonics (mi'kró-fôn'iks), n. [Pl. of microphonic: see -ics.] The science of augmenting small sounds.

microphonous (mi'kró-fôn'us), a. [As microphone + -ous.] Same as microphonic.

microphony (mi'kró-fô-ní), n. [= F. microphonie, < Gr. μικρόφωνος, weakness of voice, < μικρός, small, + φωνή, voice.] Weakness of voice.

microphotograph (mi'kró-fô-tô-gráf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. photograph.] 1. A photograph of any object, made so small as to require a microscope for its examination; "a microscopic photograph of a microscopic object" (A. C. Merritt). — 2. See photomicrograph.

microphotography (mi'kró-fô-tô-grá-fí), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. photography.] The photographing of objects of any size upon a microscope or very small scale. A notable use of microphotography was the copying of letters and dispatches to be carried by carrier pigeons during the siege of Paris in 1870. 1. Compare photomicrography.

microphthalmia (mi'kró-thal'mi-á), n. [NL., < Gr. μικροφθαλμία, having small eyes, < μικρός, small, + βλεφάρω, eye: see ophthalmia.] An abnormal smallness of the eye. Also microphthalmus.

microphthalmic (mi'kró-thal'mik), a. [< microphthalmia + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by microphthalmia.

microphthalmus (mi'kró-thal-mi), n. [< NL. microphthalmia, q. v.] Same as microphthalmia.

Microphthira (mi'kró-thí-rá), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + φθίρ, a louse.] In Latreille's system of classification, the ninth family of his Acera, or Acaridae, consisting of the six-legged larval stages of various mites. Lepus and the two other supposed genera which he located here represent the genera Arma and Trombidium. Also Microphthira.

microphthire (mi'kró-thí-ré), n. A larval acarid with six legs; a member of the Microphthira.

microphylline (mi'kró-fil'in), a. [As microphyllous + -ine.] Composed of minute leaflets or scales.

Considered in the way of analogy, the foliaceous Verrucaria may be said to represent Umbilicaria and Pannaria, passing, like both of these, into microphyllina, and, like the last, into finally almost crustaceous forms. Tuckerman, Gen. Lichenum, p. 246.

microphyllous (mi'kró-fil'us), a. [< Gr. μικροφύλλος, having small leaves, < μικρός, small, + φύλλον, leaf.] In bot., having small leaves.

microphysiography (mi'kró-fiz-i-og'ra-fí), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. physiography.] See physiography.

microphytal (mi'kró-fít'al), a. [< microphyte + -al.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or consisting of microphytes.

microphyte (mi'kró-fít), n. [= F. microphyte, < Gr. μικρός, small, + φυτόν, a plant.] A microscopic plant, especially one that is parasitic in its habits.

microphytic (mi'kró-fít'ik), a. [< microphyte + -ic.] Pertaining to or caused by microphytes: as, microphytic diseases.

micropod (mi'kró-pod), n. A member of the Micropoda.

Micropoda (mi'kró-pô-dá), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ποδῖς (podis) = E. foot.] In some systems, a division of monomyarian bivalves, comprising those which have the foot rudimentary or obsolete, as scallops, oysters, and the like.

Micropodidae (mi'kró-pod'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -ida.] In ornith., a family of fissirostral pterian birds; the swifts or Cypselidae. See cut under Cypselus.

Micropodine (mi'kró-pod'i-né), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -ine.] In ornith., the typical swifts or Cypselinae.

Micropodoides (mi'kró-pô-doi'dé-é), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -oides.] A superfamily of pterian birds composed of the swifts and humming-birds, Cypselidae and Tochitidae; Cypseliformes in a strict sense; Cypselomorpha without the Cypselulidae.

microporphyrific (mi'kró-por-fí-rít'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. porphyritic.] See porphyritic.

microprosopus (mi'kró-pro-sô'pus), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ὤψωνος, face.] In teratol., a monster with an imperfectly developed face.

micropsia (mi'kró'si-á), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὥρα, view.] In pathol., an affection of the eye in which objects appear less than their actual size.

Microptera (mi'kró-té-rá), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of micropterus, see micropterus.] In entom.: (a) The name given by Gravenhorst in 1802 to the rove-beetles (Staphylinidae) and their allies, on account of the shortness of the wing-covers. They are now called Brachelytra. (b) A group of dipterous insects named by Robineau-Desvoidy in 1830.

Micropterinae (mi'kró-té-rí-né), n. pl. [NL., < Micropterus + -ina.] A subfamily of Centrarchidae, typified by the genus Micropterus.

microptereous (mi'kró-té-rus), a. [< NL. micropterus, < Gr. μικρός, small, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] Having short wings or fins.

Micropterus (mi'kró-té-rus), n. [NL.: see microptereous.] 1. In ichth., a genus of centrarchid fishes, the type of the subfamily Micropterinae, established by Lacépède in 1802. There are two species, M. dolomieu and M. salmoides, or the small and large mouthed black bass both highly prized by sportsmen and epicures. Bass of this genus are variously known as green, lake, moor, morah, river, etc.; bass; black, yellow, and gummy perch, and trout perch; black trout, white trout, southern or Roanoke chub, and by many other local or fanciful names. Sometimes called Cryodes, see cut at black bass 1.

2. In ornith., a genus of sea-ducks of the family Anatidae and subfamily Fuligulina, named by Lesson in 1831. There is but one species, M. chirox, the well-known steamer-bird of South America. The genus is now called Tachyeres, the name Micropterus being preoccupied in ichthyology.

3. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

Still-sandpiper: Micropalama himantopus.

semipalmation of the feet; the still-sandpipers. There is but one species, M. himantopus, a common bird of North America. It is migratory through the United States in spring and fall, breeding in high latitudes.

micropantograph (mi'kró-pán'tô-gráf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pantograph.] An instrument constructed on the general principle of the pantograph for executing extremely minute writing and engraving. By means of this instrument the Lord's prayer has been written on glass within the space of $\frac{1}{100,000}$ of a square inch. Also called micrograph.

Micropuccinia (mī'krō-puk-sin'ī-jī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μυρ, small, + NL. Puccinia.] A small group of tremeloid Uredineae distinguished by Schroeter, in which only teliospores are known, as in Puccinia Prun and P. Asari. The teliospores drop off when ripe, and only germinate after a long period of rest. See Uredinea.

Micropus (mī'krō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. μυρ, small, + πους (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. In ornith.: (a) The typical genus of Micropodidae: same as Cypselus. Meyer and Wolf, 1810. (b) A genus of short-footed thrushes or Brachypodinae founded by Swainson in 1831, now referred to the Timeliidae. It contains a number of Indian and Malayan species, as M. chalcophaps, phaeophaps, melanocephalus, melanoleuca, and others. The genus is also called Microlarus, Brachypodius, Prinopus, and Locherus.

2. In ichth., a name of two genera of fishes, one founded by J. E. Gray, 1831, the other by Kner, 1868.—3. In entom., a tropical American genus of lygid bugs erected by Spinola in 1837. For a long time the destructive chinch bug of the United States was called M. destructor, but it is now placed in the genus Hemius.

micropylar (mī'krō-pī-lār), a. [micropyle + -ar.] Pertaining to or having the character of a micropyle.

micropyle (mī'krō-pīl), n. [= F. micropyle, < Gr. μυρ, small, + πύλη, gate, orifice.] 1. In bot., the orifice or canal in the coats of the ovule leading to the apex of the nucleus, through which the pollen-tube penetrates. The name is also applied to the corresponding part of the seed, which indicates the position of the embryo. See foramen, 2. See cut under amphitropous.

2. In zool.: (a) The scar or hilum of an ovum at the point of its attachment to the ovary. (b) Any opening in the coverings of an ovum through which spermatozoa may gain access to the interior, or a cluster of minute pores on the surface of an egg through which fertilization is effected. On the eggs of lepidopterous insects these pores often form a rosette at one end.

microrhabd (mī'krō-rābd), n. [Gr. μυρ, small, + NL. rhabdus, a v.] A little rhabdus; a microsclere or flesh-spicule of a sponge in the form of a rhabdus. W. J. Sollas, Eneye. Brit., XXII. 417.

microrheometrical (mī'krō-rē-o-met'ri-kal), a. [Gr. μυρ, small, + ρῆμα, a flowing (< ρῆναι, flow), + μετρον, a measure, (< ρῆμα, rhematic).] Pertaining to a method of determining the nature of bodies in solution when flowing through small or capillary tubes.

Microrhynchus (mī'krō-ring'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μυρ, small, + ῥυγχή, snout, beak.] In mammal., a genus of woolly lemurs, of the subfamily Indrisme. The species is called M. laniger. See arabi.

Microsauria (mī'krō-sā'ri-jī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μυρ, small, + σαύρος, a lizard.] A group of labyrinthodont amphibians founded by J. W. Dawson upon the genera Dendropteron, Hylropteron, and Hylonotus.

microsaurian (mī'krō-sā'ri-an), a. and n. [Microsauria + -an.] 1. a. Pertaining to the Microsauria, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the group Microsauria.

microsclere (mī'krō-skler), n. [NL. microsclerum, < Gr. μυρ, small, + σκληρός, hard.] A flesh-spicule of a sponge. Microscleres are generally of minute size, and serve usually for the support of a single cell.

microsclerous (mī'krō-skler'us), a. [As microsclere + -ous.] Having the character of a microsclere.

microsclerum (mī'krō-skler'um), n. pl. microsclera (-rī). [NL.] Same as microsclere.

microscope (mī'krō-skōp), n. [= F. microscope = Sp. Pg. It. microscopio, < NL. microscopium, < Gr. μυρ, small, + σκοπεω, view.] 1. An optical instrument consisting of a lens or combination of lenses (in some cases mirrors also) which magnifies and thus renders visible minute objects that cannot be seen by the naked eye, or enlarges the apparent magnitude of small visible bodies, so as to render possible the examination of their texture or structure. The simple microscope, which is the simplest form, is merely a convex lens, near to which the object to be examined is placed; it is also called a magnifying-glass or lupa (see magnify, lens, under lens). The compound microscope consists essentially of two lenses, or systems of lenses, one of which, the object-glass or objective, forms an enlarged inverted image of the object, and the other, the eyepiece or ocular, magnifies this image. The eyepiece and objective (see these words) are placed at the opposite ends of the tube or body, which is often made of two closely fitting parts so that its length (and thus the distance between the glasses) can be varied at will; it is then called a draw-tube. The object under examination is placed upon a support, called the stage, beneath the objective; its position upon this may be adjusted by the hand, or, better, the object and the stage (then called a mechanical stage) are moved together by some mechanical arrangement, as, for example, by two screws giving motions in two directions at right angles. The proper distance between the objective and the object (such that the image of the latter shall be seen clearly, or be in focus) is usually attained by the movement of the tube as a whole. This is accomplished by the rapid motion of the coarse adjustment, and more slowly and accurately, as is necessary in the case of high powers, by an arrangement called the slow motion or fine adjustment. The necessary illumination is obtained by a concave mirror below the stage, which reflects the light upon the object. An achromatic condenser, usually in connection with a diaphragm, is often added to converge the light more strongly. For opaque objects a bull's-eye condenser, a Heberkuhn, or some other form of reflector is employed. The body of the microscope, with the stage, etc., is supported firmly upon a stand, and usually attached by a joint which allows of its being inclined at any desired angle between the vertical and horizontal positions. Many accessories, or special devices applicable to particular uses, may be added to the microscope in its essential form, as a micrometer, polarizing prisms, camera lucida, etc. The compound microscope itself often varies widely in construction, according to the character of the work for which it is to be used. (Compare also the phrases below.)

2. [cap.] A constellation. See Microscopium.—

Achromatic microscope. See achromatic.—Binocular microscope. A microscope so constructed that the object may be viewed simultaneously by both eyes, with the advantage (usually but not necessarily attained) that it is then seen in relief. It has a single objective, but two tubes, each with its own eyepiece, a prism causes the luminous rays from the objective to separate and pass through each tube.—Double-bodied microscope. A microscope in which the object under examination can be viewed by more than one person at the same time. As in the binocular microscope, a prism divides the rays from the objective. Two other prisms receive the separated rays, and the respective pencils are directed through the different bodies of the instrument.

Filar microscope. A microscope having cross wires in the focus of the eyepiece.—Inverted or chemical microscope. One with the object-glass placed beneath the object and the stage. The luminous rays which have passed down through it are reflected by an inverting prism up the obliquely placed tube to the eyepiece. This form is sometimes used in chemical work, when acid fumes are present.—Magnifying power of a microscope. See magnify.—Monocular microscope. One with a single tube, for use with one eye only.—Panoramic microscope. A name sometimes given to a microscope having the eyepiece in a sliding draw-tube (see def. 1).—Petrographical microscope. A form of microscope especially adapted for minute study of the structure of rocks. It is provided with a graduated and revolving stage and an arrangement for accurately centering the object glass. It has also a polarizing apparatus, of which the upper Nicol prism or analyzer is contained in a separate support which can be easily revolved on a graduated circle or removed at will. The lower Nicol or polarizer is supported beneath the stage, and can also be revolved in a graduated collar. With these arrangements the directions of light-extinction in a section of a crystal can easily be determined. Besides the usual eyepiece and object-glass, an additional lens, or series of lenses, can be placed over the lower Nicol prism when converging light is required, as in examining the uniaxial or biaxial interference-figures of crystal-sections.—Reflecting microscope. A form of microscope in which the object is placed outside of the tube, or outside the axis of the tube and reflects its image to the speculum by means of a plane mirror inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the tube and an oxyhydrogen the former.—Solar, lucernal, and oxyhydrogen microscopes. Instruments in which the illumination em-played comes from the sun, a lamp, and an oxyhydrogen flame-light respectively.

microscope-lamp (mī'krō-skōp-lamp), n. A special form of lantern, usually provided with a reflector, a bull's-eye lens, and a metallic chimney lined with some poor conductor of heat. Means are provided for adjusting the lamp in any position in order to throw the light upon the object under examination.

microscopic (mī'krō-skōp'ik), a. [F. microscopique = Sp. Pg. It. microscopico, < NL. microscopicus, < microscopium, microscope: see microscope.] 1. Pertaining to a microscope, or having its character or function; adapted to the purposes of a microscope, or to the inspection of minute objects: as, a microscopic lens, eyepiece, or stand; microscopic sight or vision.

Why has not man a microscopic eye?
For this plain reason, man is not a fly.
Pope, Essay on Man, l. 193

Such microscopic proof of skill and power
As, hid from ages past, God now displays.
Cooper, Thirteenth, l. 637.

The present limit to microscopic vision is simply the goodness of the objective.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 2d ser., XLVIII. 172.

2. Of minute size; so small as to be invisible or indistinct to the naked eye; adapted to or prepared for examination by the microscope: as, microscopic creatures or particles; a microscopic object.—3. Made or effected by or as if by the aid of a microscope; hence, relating to things of minute size or significance; infinitesimal; petty: as, microscopic observations or investigations; microscopic criticism.

So far as microscopic analysis would enable us to decide this question. Todd and Bowman, Physiol. Anat., II. 301.

4. Characteristic of the microscope or its use: as, to observe anything with microscopic minuteness; microscopic definition of an object.—5. Employing or working with a microscope, or as if with a microscope.

The tree that has stood for centuries bears to the microscopic investigator marks of every winter that has passed over it. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 103.

Also microscopical.

Microscopica (mī'krō-skōp'ī-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of microscopicus: see microscopic.] In zool., microscopic animals; microzoans; applied to infusorians, rotifers, and other animalcules.

microscopical (mī'krō-skōp'ī-kal), a. [microscopic + -al.] Same as microscopic.

microscopically (mī'krō-skōp'ī-kal-ī), adv. [microscopical + -ly.] In a microscopic manner or degree; by means of, or so as to require the use of, the microscope: as, to examine a plant microscopically; an object microscopically small.

microscopist (mī'krō-skōp'ist), n. [F. microscopiste = It. microscopista; as microscope + -ist.] One skilled or versed in microscopy; one who makes use of the microscope.

Microscopium (mī'krō-skōp'ī-um), n. [NL.: see microscope.] A constellation south of Capricorn, introduced by Lacaille in 1752.

microscopy (mī'krō-skōp'ī), n. [= F. microscopie = Sp. microscopia; as microscope + -y.] The act or art of using the microscope; investigation with the microscope: as, to be skilled in microscopy.

microsection (mī'krō-sek'shon), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. section.] A slice, as of rock, cut so thin as to be more or less transparent, and mounted on a glass in convenient form to be studied with the aid of the microscope.

microseism (mī'krō-sīsm), n. [Gr. μυσός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking.] A slight or weak earthquake-tremor.

We may feel sure that earth tremors or microseisms are not confined to countries habitually visited by the grosser sort of earthquakes.

G. H. Darville, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 268.

microseismic (mī'krō-sīsm'ik), a. [microseism + -ic.] In seismology, of, pertaining to, or of the nature of microseisms, or very slight earthquake-tremors.

Should microseismic observation enable us to say when and where the minute movements of the soil will reach a head, a valuable contribution to the insurance of human safety in earthquake regions will have been attained.

J. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 304.

microseismical (mī'krō-sīsm'ī-kal), a. [microseismic + -al.] Microseismic.

A series of microseismical observations.

J. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 316.

microseismograph (mī'krō-sīsm'ī-grāf), n. [Gr. μυσός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking, + γράφω, write.] An instrument for measuring and recording very slight earthquake-shocks or earthquakes.

microseismometry (mī'krō-sis-mom'et-ri), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, a measure.] The measurement or observation of slight earth-tremors.

The account that is given of the labours of Italian observers in the field of microseismometry is meagre and unsatisfactory. Nature, XXXIX, 330.

microsema (mī'krō-sēm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σήμα, mark, sign: see sema.] In craniom., having an orbital index below 84.

The skulls agree with the ordinary Bushman skull in most respects, being microsema. A. Macalister, Jour. Anthropol. Inst., XVI, 150.

microseptum (mī'krō-sep'tum), n.; pl. microsepta (-tā). [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ΝΙ. septum, q. v.] A small imperfect or sterile septum or mesentery of an actinozoan. See microseptum.

microsiphon (mī'krō-sī'fon), n. See siphon and microsiphonula.

microsiphonula (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lā), n.; pl. microsiphonulae (-lā). [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σίφων, a tube, pipe: see siphon.] The larval stage of certain cephalopods, as ammonoids, nautiloids, and belemnoids, during which the small tubular siphon or microsiphon makes its appearance. Huytt, Proc. Boet. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887.

microsiphonular (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lār), a. [< microsiphonula + -ar.] Of or pertaining to a microsiphonula.

microsiphonulate (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lat), a. [< microsiphonula + -at.] Provided with or characterized by a microsiphon. Amer. Nat., XXII, 878.

microsiphonulation (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lā'shon), n. [< microsiphonula + -ation.] The formation or the possession of a microsiphon; the state of being microsiphonulate. Amer. Nat., XXII, 878.

microsoma (mī'krō-sō'mā), n.; pl. microsomata (-tā). [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body.] A little body or corpuscle; one of the minute granules embedded in the hyaline plasma of the protoplasm of vegetable cells, and constituting an essential portion of its substance. These granules have a high degree of refringency, and are very deeply stained by hematoxylin.

microsome (mī'krō-som), n. [< N.L. micro-soma.] Same as microsoma. Nature, XXX, 183.

microsomia (mī'krō-sō'mi-jī), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body.] The state of being dwarfed; dwarfishness.

microsomite (mī'krō-sō'mit), n. [< microsoma + -ite.] One of the smaller permanent or definitive somites or metameres of which an animal body may be composed; a secondary segment, succeeding the primary segments or macrosomites.

microsomitic (mī'krō-sō'mit'ik), a. [< microsomite + -ic.] Having the character of a microsomite; relating to microsomites. Amer. Nat., XXII, 941.

microsomite (mī'krō-som'it), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα (see def.) + -ite.] A mineral related in composition and form to nephelin. It is found in minute acicular hexagonal crystals in the lava of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

Microsorex (mī'krō-sō'reks), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. sorex = Gr. ιαξ, a shrew-mouse.] A genus of very small North American shrews, of the family Soricidae and subfamily Soricinae, having 30 teeth. S. hoyi is the typical species. Coues, 1877.

microspectroscope (mī'krō-spek'trō-skōp), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. spectroscop.] A combination of the spectroscope with the microscope, by the use of which it is possible to examine the absorption-bands in minute quantities of a substance. The arrangement ordinarily employed consists of a series of glass prisms in a small tube which is attached above the achromatic eyepiece.

Microsperma (mī'krō-spēr'mē), n. pl. [N.L. (Benth and Hooker, 1883), < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπέρμα, a seed.] A series of monocotyledonous plants, characterized by a perianth which is corolla-like, at least on the inside, by an inferior ovary which is one-celled with three parietal placentae, or rarely three-celled with axillary placentae, and by numerous very small seeds. The series embraces three orders, Hydrocharitaceae (the frog-bit family), Burmanniaceae, and Orchidaceae (the orchid family), including about 5,000 species, 5,000 of which belong to Orchidaceae.

Microsphaera (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. [N.L. (Leveillé, 1851), < Gr. μικρός, small, + σφαίρα, a sphere.] A genus of parasitic pyrenomycetous fungi of the group Erysiphaceae. The perithecia, which contain several asci, has several appendages radiating from it like the spokes of a wheel. These appendages are free from the mycelium, and are more or less dichotomously branched at the tips, often in a very beautiful manner. About 50 species are known, of which nearly 30 occur in North America. M. Ravenelii is injurious to the honey-locust (Gleditsia). M. alni (the M. Friesii of authors) occurs on various species of Ceanothus, Viburnum, Linnaea, Spraguea, Platanus, Juglans, and Carya; and M. quercina is found on various species of oak. See Erysiphaceae.

microsporangiophore (mī'krō-spo-ran'ji-ō-for), n. [< N.L. microsporangium, q. v., + Gr. φέρω, < φέρω = E. bear.] The foliage-leaves which surround or protect the spore-bearing leaves of certain hypothetical archaic cryptogams, and from which the flower of flowering plants may have been evolved.

The origin of this primeval flower from a somewhat fern like cryptogam, of which the foliage leaves, the envelopes of the spore bearing leaves, the micro and macro sporangiophores, had become permanently differentiated in ascending order. Geddes, Kewy. Brit., XVI, 846.

microsporangium (mī'krō-spo-ran'ji-um), n.; pl. microsporangia (-jā). [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ΝΙ. sporangium, q. v.] A sporangium containing microspores: the homologue of the pollen-sac in phanerogams.

microspore (mī'krō-spōr), n. [= F. microspora, < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπορά, a seed.] 1. In bot., an asexually produced spore of small size as compared with others produced by the same species: the homologue of the pollen-grain of phanerogams.

In some of the living club mosses there are two kinds of spores, one being much larger than the other. The larger are known as macrospores, whilst the smaller are called microspores. Huxley, Physicography, p. 231.

2. In zool., one of the spore-like elements of exceedingly minute size, but very numerous, produced through the encystment and subsequent subdivision of many monads.

microsporine (mī'krō-spo-rin), a. [< microspore + -ine.] Noting one of the two kinds of microbes reported by Klebs to be uniformly present in diphtheria. They are micrococci in form and are found chiefly upon the tonsils and mark a less serious phase of the disease. The accuracy of these conclusions has been questioned.

Microsporon (mī'krō-spo-rōn), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπορά, seed.] A genus or class of fungi producing various skin-diseases. M. furfur, which produces pityriasis versicolor, consists of hyphae having long articulations intermixed with round spores and grows between the cells of the epidermis, effecting their rapid degeneration. M. Audouini, so called, produces pediculi another skin-disease. According to Grunwitz, however, these forms, as well as those described as Achorion, the fungus of favus, and Trichophyton, the fungus of tinea, are all the same thing, only differing from one another in size. This difference is attributed to differences in the food. The M. diphthericum of Klebs is a microspore.

microsporophyll, microsporophyll (mī'krō-spo-rof'il), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σπορά, seed, + φύλλον, leaf.] The leaf-bearing microsporangium of the heterosporous Pteridophyta: the homologue of the stamen in phanerogams.

microsporous (mī'krō-spo-rōs), a. [< microspore + -ous.] Resembling or derived from a microspore.

Microsthenia (mī'krōs'thē-ni), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σθένος, strength.] In J. D. Dana's classification, the third order of Mammalia, composed of the chiroptera, insectivores, rodents, and edentata. The Microsthenia correspond to the Eucenecephala of Owen, and to the Incaubillan series of placental mammals of Bonaparte and Gill.

microsthene (mī'krōs'thēn), n. A member of the order Microsthenia.

microsthenic (mī'krōs'thēn'ik), a. [< Microsthenia + -ic.] Pertaining to or characteristic of the Microsthenia. J. D. Dana, Cephalization, p. 9.

Microstoma (mī'krōs'tō-mā), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + στήν, mouth.] 1. In ichth., a genus of small-mouthed fishes, typifying the family Microstomatidae, as M. grienlandica. Cuvier, 1817.—2. In Fernia, the typical genus of Microstomatida. M. linearis is an example. Also Microstomum.

microstome (mī'krōs'tōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στήν, a mouth.] In bot., a small mouth or orifice, as that belonging to the capsule of certain mosses.

Microstomidae (mī'krōs'tōm'ī-dē), n. pl. [N.L., < Microstoma, or Microstomum, + -idae.] 1. In ichth., a family of malacopecterygian fishes, typified by the genus Microstoma, containing a few deep-sea fishes related to the argentinea and smelts. Also Microstomatidae.—2. A family of rhabdocelous turbellarians, typified by the genus Microstoma, having a small extensile mouth near the anterior end of the body, together with laterally ciliated pits. These turbellarians are more remarkably characterized by the separation of the sexes, hermaphroditism being the rule in the Rhabdocela. They multiply both by ova and by spontaneous fission.

microstructure (mī'krō-struk'tūr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small (with ref. to microscopie), + E. structure.] Microscopic structure.

This rock . . . has a microstructure very similar to that of many micrites. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV, 106.

microstylar (mī'krō-stī-lār), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, pillar (see stylē), + -ar.] In arch., having, pertaining to, or consisting of a small style or column.

Microstylis (mī'krō-stī-lis), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, dim. of στυλος, a pillar: see stylē.] A genus of terrestrial orchids of the tribe Epidendrea and the subtribe Mularcea, characterized by a stem bearing from one to three leaves, and by the new shoots arising from the base of the bulb of the previous year. They are small herbs with broad membranaceous leaves, which are contracted into a sheath or a sheathing petiole, and small, often greenish or yellowish flowers, which grow in terminal racemes. About 45 species are known, which are indigenous to Europe, Asia, and North and South America. M. ophioglossoides in the United States, bears the name of adder's mouth, which is also extended to the other species. See adder's mouth.

microstyspore (mī'krō-stī-lo-spōr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, a pillar, + σπόρος, a seed: see stylispor.] A styspore of small size as compared with others produced in the same species.

microstylous (mī'krō-stī-lus), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, a pillar: see stylē.] In bot., having the style small or short and associated with long stamens, as compared with long styles associated with short stamens.

microtasmeter (mī'krō-tā-sim'et-er), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. tasmeter.] An instrument invented by Edison for detecting and measuring very slight pressures. A rigid iron frame holds a carbon button which is placed between two air faces of platinum, one stationary and the other movable, and in a device which holds the object to be tested so that, as the object expands, the pressure resulting from the expansion acts upon the carbon-button.

microtelephone (mī'krō-tel'ē-fōn), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. telephone.] A telephone capable of rendering audible very weak sounds.

microtelephonic (mī'krō-tel'ē-fōn'ik), a. [< microtelephone + -ic.] Pertaining to the microtelephone. Microtelephonic apparatus, apparatus for transmitting, or for rendering audible, very weak sounds.

microthere (mī'krō-thēr), n. A member of the genus Microtherium.

Microtherium (mī'krō-thēr'i-um), n. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + θήρ, wild beast.] A genus of artiodactyl ungulate mammals established by Von Meyer upon remains discovered in the Miocene of Europe. The position of the genus is questionable. Owen considered it related to the chevrotains (Troglodytes). It probably belongs to the anoplotheriid series. It is also called Amphomeryx.

microtherm (mī'krō-thēr-m), n. [< F. microtherme, < Gr. μικρός, small, + θέρμη, heat.] A plant of Alphonse de Candolle's fourth physiological group, consisting of those forms which are confined to climates whose mean annual temperature is between 14° and 0° C. They are found on the plains of the north temperate zone in Europe, Asia, and North America well northward, and in South America between latitudes 38 and 60 N.

microtome (mī'krō-tōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + τέμνω, < τέμνω, to cut.] An instrument for making very fine sections or thin slices of objects for microscopic examination.

microtomic (mī'krō-tōm'ik), a. [< microtome + -ic.] Cutting in fine or thin slices; relating to the use of the microtome or to microtomy.

microtomic (mī'krō-tōm'ik), a. [< microtome + -al.] Same as microtomic. Amer. Nat., XXI, 1130.

microtomet (mī'krō-tō-mist), n. [< microtome + -ist.] One who is expert in the use of a microtome. Microscop. Sci., XXX.

microtomy (mī'krō-tō-mi), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + τέμνω, < τέμνω, to cut: see anatomy.] The art of preparing thin slices of tissues, in order to study the histological details of organization.

microvolt (mī'krō-vōlt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. volt.] A millionth part of a volt.

Microzoa (mī'krō-zō'ā), n. pl. [N.L., pl. of microzoön.] Microscopic animals, or Microscopica; Microzoaria.

microzoal (mī'krō-zō'al), a. [< Microzoa + -al.] Of or pertaining to the Microzoa.

microzoan (mī-kro-zō'ān), n. and a. I. n. An animalcule; a member of the Microzoa.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Microzoa.

Microzoaria (mī-kro-zō-ā'ri-ā), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ζῷον, zōion, pl. ζῷα, zōia, dim. of Gr. ζῷον, animal.] De Blainville's name for infusorians, rotifers, and other animalcules.

microzoarian (mī-kro-zō-ā'ri-ān), a. and n. [< Microzoaria + -an.] I. a. Animalcular; of or pertaining to the Microzoaria.

II. n. An animalcule; a member of the Microzoaria.

microzoary (mī-kro-zō-ā'ri), n.; pl. microzoaries (-riz). [< N.L. Microzoaria.] A microzoarian.

microzooid (mī-kro-zō-oid), n. and a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ζῷον, zōion.] I. n. A free-swimming zooid of abnormally minute size, which conjugates with or becomes buried within the substance of the body of a normally sized sedentary animalcule of many Locustella.

II. a. Pertaining to a microzooid.

microzoön (mī-kro-zō-ōn), n.; pl. microzoa (-j). [N.L., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ζῷον, an animal.] Any micro-organism of animal nature; a microzoarian.

microzoöspore (mī-kro-zō-ō' spōr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + Ε. ζῷοσπῶρ.] A zoöspore of small size as compared with others produced by the same species.

The smaller or microzoöspores are produced by the division of the vegetative mother cell into a larger number of portions. Huxford and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 301.

microzyme (mī-kro-zim), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ζῷον, heaven; see zyme.] One of a class of extremely small living creatures, existing in the atmosphere, and furnishing the basis on which certain epizootic, epidemic, and other zymotic diseases are dependent for their existence; a zymotic microbe. These pestiferous microbes have some characters at least in which they resemble ferments, and by multiplying rapidly they exert a morbid action in the animal organism with which they come in contact. See germ theory (under germ), and cultures under microbe.

Mictidae (mīk'ti-de), n. pl. [N.L. (Serville, 1843), < Mictis + -idae.] A family of heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Mictis, having the femora spined beneath, and the hind ones thicker than the others, especially in the males. It comprises many tropical and sub-tropical forms, some of large size and handsome coloration, as Bachylus gigas, a North American representative. There are about 13 genera of the family. Also Mictides, Mictida, and (as a subfamily of Coreidae) Mictina, Mictinæ.

Packys gigas, a member of the Mictidae.

miction (mīk'shŏn), n. [= F. miction, < L.L. mictio(n), mictio(n), < L. mictare, pp. mictus, mictus (= AS. migan, early ME. migen = MLG. migen = Lecl. miga), urinate.] The act of voiding urine.

Mictis (mīk'tis), n. [N.L. (Leach, 1814); origin not ascertained.] The typical genus of Mictida, having the fourth antennal joint not shorter than the third. Nearly 100 species are described from Africa, southern Asia, the Malay archipelago, and Australia.

micturate (mīk'tu-rat), v. i.; pret. and pp. micturated, pp. micturating. [Irreg. < L. micturari, pp. micturatus, urinate; see micturition.] To pass urine; urinate.

micturition (mīk'tu-rish-on), n. [= F. micturition, < L. as if micturitiō*(n), < micturere, pp. micturatus, go to urinate, desiderative of mictare, pp. mictus, urinate; see miction.] The act of urinating; especially, morbidly frequent and scant urination.

mid¹ (mid), a. and n. [< ME. mid, middle, myd, mydde, < AS. mid (n. noun form not actually found; gen. masc. and neut. midde, fem. midre, midre, etc.) = OS. midit = OFries. midde, medde = MLG. mydde (a.), D. midde (n.) = MLG. midde (a.) = OHG. mitti, MLG. G. mitte = Lecl. midre = *Sw. Hence midst¹, middle, etc.] I. a. 1. Middle; being the middle part or midst. The monosyllable mid, properly an adjective, is so closely connected with its noun as to assume often the aspect of a prefix: It is therefore often joined to its noun with a hyphen. The real relation, however, is nearly always the normal one of adjective and noun.

Prov. What is the time of day?

Art. Past the mid season.

Shak. Tempest, I. 2. 230.

Virgins and boys, mid age and wrinkled old.

Shak. T. and C. II. 2. 104.

Then, with envy fraught and rage,

Flies to his place, nor rests, but in mid air

To counsel summons all his mighty peers.

Milton, P. R., I. 39.

No more the mounting larks, while Daphne sings,

Shall, hasting in mid air, suspend their wings.

Pope, Winter, I. 54.

2. Being between; intermediate; intervening; only in inseparable compounds: as, midrib, midriff, midweek.

II. n. Middle; midst.

mid (mid), prep. An abbreviation of amid, used in poetry.

mida (mī'dā), n. [N.L., < Gr. μῖδα, a destructive insect in pulse.] The larva of the bean-fly. Imp. Dict.

midan (mī'dān), n. [Hind., < Pers. maidān.] An open space, or esplanade, in or near a town; an open grassy plain; a parade-ground; among the Arabs, a race-course, or a place for exercising horses. Also spelled maidān.

The maidān, or parade ground, with its long-drawn arrays of Sepoy chivalry.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 262.

midangle (mīd'ang-gl), n. [< mid¹ + angle³.] An angle of 45°; half of a right angle.

Midas¹ (mī'das), n. [N.L., < (1.) L. Midas, < Gr. Μῖδας, a king of Phrygia.] A genus of marmosets, typical of the family Mididae. Upward of 20 species are described. Characteristic examples are the lion-marmoset, M. leoninus (the tamarin (M. aotus)), the pinche M. aotus, and the markia (M. rostrata).

Midas² (mī'das), n. [N.L., < Gr. μῖδας, a destructive insect in pulse.] In entom., the typical genus of Mididae or Midasiidae. The species are mainly North American, as 26 against 3 in Europe. Their larvae as far as known occur in decaying wood, and are probably carnivorous. M. fulvipes and M. elegant are examples. Latreille, 1796. Also Mydas (Pachy 1870).

Midasidæ (mī-das'īd-ē), n. pl. [N.L., irreg. < Midias + -idæ.] In entom., same as Mididae, 2. Leach, 1819.

Midas's-ear (mī'das-ez-ēr), n. [So called in allusion to Midas, a king of Phrygia, who, for a decision he rendered in a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, was provided by Apollo (who lost) with ass's ears.] A gastropod of the family Juriculidae, Juricula midæ.

midbody (mīd'bod'ī), n. [< mid¹ + body.] In Mollusca, the mesosoma.

midbrain (mīd'brān), n. [< mid¹ + brain.] The mesencephalon. See cuts under encephalon.

mid-couples (mīd'kup'lz), n. pl. In Scots law, the writings by which an heir, assignee, or adjudger is connected with a precept of sasine granted in favor of his predecessor or author, which, when such heir, etc., takes infeftment in virtue of such precept, must be deduced in the instrument of sasine. Imp. Dict.

midday (mīd'dā), n. and a. [< ME. midday, < AS. middæg (also middeldæg) (= OFries. middei = D. midtag = MLG. midach = OHG. mittatag, MLG. mittatag, G. mittag = *Sw. middle (mīd'l), a. and n. [< ME. middel, myddel, medel, < AS. middel = OFries. middel = D. mittel = MLG. middel = OHG. mittil, MLG. G. mittel = Sw. medel = Dan. midde¹ (in comp.), adj., middle; also in AS., D., MLG., MLG., G., as a noun, middle, in G. also meapa; AS. also midde², n., the middle; = Lecl. medhal = Sw. medel = Dan. midde¹, n., means, medicine; cf. Lecl. medhal, prep., among; with formative -el, from the adj., AS., etc., mid: see midl.] I. a. 1. Equally distant from the extremes or limits; mean; middling; as, the middle point of a line; the middle time of life.

I will go the middell way,

And write a boke bytwene the tway.

These are flowers

(Of middle summer, and, I think, they are given

To men of middle age. Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 108.

That middle course to steer,

To cowardice and craft so dear,

Scott, Robbery, l. 22.

2. Intervening; intermediate.

A matter duly prepared, and made ready beforehand, and now lying in a middle state, between its first rudiments and decline. Bacon, Physical Fables, vii., Expl.

Will, seeking good, find many middle euda.

Sir J. Davies, Immortal, of the Soul, § 30.

3. In gram.: (a) Intermediate between active and passive; applied to a body of verb-forms of which the office is more or less distinctly reflexive, or denotes the subject as acting on or for or with reference to itself, often answering to an English intransitive verb: as, middle voice, middle ending, middle tense. Such forms, distinguished by their endings, belonged to the original Indo-European verb, and are retained by some of the extant languages, especially Sanskrit and Greek. In Greek the middle voice (μεσση messe, μεσση messe) serves also as passive, except in the future and aorist. (b) Intermediate between smooth (unspirated) and rough (aspirated): as, a middle (medial) mute. See mutic.

n.—Middle ages. See age.—Middle bookst. a course of study intermediate between the Elements of Euclid and the Almagest of Ptolemy.—Middle C. see C.—Middle chest. See chest.—Middle class. that class of the people which is socially and conventionally intermediate between the aristocratic class, or nobility, and the laboring class; the unfitted community of well-born or wealthy people, made up of landed proprietors, professional men, and merchants; in Great Britain commonly subdivided into upper and lower middle classes. In the United States no class-distinction of this nature exists.

He [Pitt] looked for support not . . . to a strong aristocratic connection, not . . . to the personal favour of the sovereign, but to the middle class of Englandmen.

Macaulay, William Pitt, Earl of Chatham.

Middle distance. See distance.—Middle English. See English.—Middle genus. See genus.—Middle Greek. See Greek.—Middle ground. (a) In painting, etc., same as middle distance. (b) Naut., a shallow place, as a bank or bar. Middle Latin. latitudo, meatus, mediastinum, etc. See the nouns.—Middle part or voice. In music, a part or voice that lies in the middle of the harmony, as the alto and tenor in ordinary music.—Middle passage. that part of the middle Atlantic which lies between the West Indies and the west coast of the continent of Africa; as, the horrors of the middle passage (referring to the slave-trade).—Middle post. in arch., same as king-post.—Middle spaces. in printing the spaces most used in the composition of type—the three em (one third) and the four em (one fourth) of the body.—Middle States. the States which originally formed the middle part of the United States, intermediate between New England and the Southern States, namely New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware.—Middle stitching. same as mont's seam, l.—Middle term. that term of a syllogism which appears twice in the premises, but is eliminated from the conclusion. Also called mean term.

II. n. 1. The point or part equally distant from the extremities, limits, or extremes; a mean.

See, there come people down by the middle of the land.

Judges ix. 37.

Beauty no other thing is then a beam

Flash't out between the middle and extreme.

Herick, Definition of Beauty.

It is a point of difficulty to choose an exact middle between two ill extremes.

Swift, Sentiments of a Ch. of Eng. Man, ii.

2. Specifically, the middle part of the human body; the waist.

His myddel anal, his armer longe and skeldre.

Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 268.

Another time [he] was legged up to the middle in the slough of Loehend.

Scott, Guy Rannering, viii.

3. An intervening point or part in space, time, or arrangement; something intermediate.

I . . . with capacious mind

Consider'd all things visible in heaven,

Or earth, or middle.

Milton, P. L., ix. 603.

4. In logic, same as middle term.—5. In gram., same as middle voice. See l. 3.—Fallacy of no middle. of undistributed middle, of unreal middle. See fallacy.—Middle of the road. an epithet applied, especially in the presidential campaign of 1896, to those members of the Populist party who urged the nomination of a Populist by their party convention and opposed the acceptance of the nominee of the Democratic party; said to be derived from the habit, in some parts of the South-west, of keeping in the middle of the road, the better to protect one's self from enemies lying in ambush. [U. S. political slang].—The principle of excluded middle or third. one of the principles of negation, according to which there is no individual that is not included either under any given term or under its negative. It may also be stated by saying that the negative of the negative of any term is included under that term. The converse statement that the negative of the negative of any term includes that term is the principle of contradiction. These two principles, taken together, define negation.

—Syn. 1. Center, Midst, Middle. Center is a precise word, ordinarily applied to circular, globular, or regular bodies: as, the center of a circle, globe, field; but it is used wherever a similar exactness appears to exist: as, the center of a crowd. Midst regards the person or thing as enveloped or surrounded on all sides, especially by that which is close upon him or it, thick or dense: as, in the midst of the forest, the waves, troubles, one's thoughts. Except as thus modified by the idea of envelopment or close environment, the old idea of midst as meaning the middle point (see Gen. i. 6; Josh. vii. 23; 1 Kl. xlii. 35) is quite obsolete. Middle is very often used abstractly or figuratively, center rarely, midst never. Middle is often applied to extent in only one direction: as, the middle of the street, of a block of houses, of a string; it is often less precise than center: compare the center and the middle of a room.

The pride, the market-place, the crown

And center of the potter's trade.

Longfellow, Keramos, l. 68.

Jesus himself stood in the midst of them.

Luke xxi. 20.

In the dual vast and middle of the night.

Shak., Hamlet, l. 2. 198.

bacon. [Western and southern U. S.].—3. pl.

In milling, the parts of a kernel of grain next the skin of the berry, largely composed of gluten and considered the most nutritious part.

In the older methods of milling this was ground as fine as possible together with the also by part and the bran, and then the whole was bolted to separate the bran. By the newer high milling methods, the middlings are passed through a purifying machine and re-ground, forming a very pure flour, with large and more uniform granules than that from the first grinding.

4. pl. The coarse particles resulting from milling, intermingled with a certain quantity of bran and foreign matters, used as feed for farm stock;

canaille.

middling (mid'ling), adv. [< middling, a.] Tol-

The L. musca = Gr. μύα, etc., a fly, is not related; see Musca.] 1. A two-winged fly of the order Diptera and suborder Nemocera; a gnāt or some insect resembling one: a popular name applied with little discrimination to many different insects. They chiefly belong to the families Stratiotidae, Tipulidae, Chironomidae, and Culicidae. The term is sometimes specifically applied to the Chironomidae. The eggs of some of the last-named family, like those of mosquitoes and other gnāts, are deposited in water, where they undergo metamorphosis, first into larvae and then into pupae, in which latter state when ripe they rise to the surface, and the imago or perfect insect emerges. See gnāt. 2. Something small of its kind, as the fry of fish; a dwarf; a midgole. A very small fish, specifically called Günther's midge and Hypoclinemus argenteus, occasionally taken on both the American and European coasts, is supposed to be the fry of a codling of the genus Phycis. 3. A very small one-horse carriage used in the Isle of Wight, England.*

mid-parent (mid'pār'ent), n. A hypothetical parent whose stature is taken to be a mean between the actual stature of a father and that of a mother. See the extract.

If we take the height of the father and the height of the mother multiplied by 1.08 -- the ratio of male to female stature -- draw the mean between the two, and call this the height of the mid-parent, then the height of the child will be nearer to the average of the race than the height of the mid-parent.

Science, XIII. 206.

mid-parentage (mid'pār'en-tāj), n. The character or quality of a hypothetical mid-parent.

By the use of this word ["deviate"] and that of mid-parentage, we can define the law of regression very briefly.

Galton, Science, VI. 270.

Midrash (mid'rash), n. [< Heb. midrash, commentary, exposition, < dārash, tread, frequent, seek, search, apply oneself to.] 1. In Jewish lit., exegesis, interpretation, or exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures. Specifically the word denotes hagadic or free interpretation or exposition of a homiletic, allegorical, and popular nature, interspersed with maxims and ethical sayings of eminent men, and with illustrations drawn from the natural world, as well as from all departments of human learning and experience. Compare haggadah.

2. An exposition or discourse of this kind, or a collection of such expositions or discourses: as, the Midrash on Samuel; the Midrash on the Psalms. In this sense the plural is Midrashim, occasionally Midrashoth.

Midrashic (mid-rash'ik), a. [< Midrash + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or akin to the Midrash; hag-gadic.

In my midst of, in the midst of my . . . [Rare.]

And in my midst of sorrow and heart-grief
To show them feats. Milton, S. A., l. 1838.

In our, your, their midst, in the midst of us, you, them. These phrases have been objected to by some writers on English, but with no good reason.

In their midst a form was seen. Montgomery.

That in their midst, in our midst, &c., are at odds with the "genius" of our language, is an assertion somewhat adventurous. As concerns a substantive, its subjective genitive, universally, and its objective genitive, very often, may be expressed prepositively. Love of God, intending "love emanating from God," may be exchanged for God's love: but we also say, Plato's commentators, and the world's end. To come to possessive pronouns, we have no scruples about the objective to his pleasure, my thy praise, in my absence, on your account, to their discredit, in our despite, his equal, &c., &c.; and with these phrases in our midst is rightly comparable. . . . With reference to analogical principles in our midst is altogether irreproachable. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 50.

midst¹ (midst), adv. [*< midst*¹, n., itself orig. an adv., in connection with a prep.] In the middle.

midsummer (mid'sum'er), n. [< ME. midsommer, < AS. midsunor, midsunor (= MLat. midsommer = G? midsommer = Isel. midsumar = Sw. midsommar = Dan. midsommer), < mid, mid, + summer, summer.] The middle of summer; the period of the summer solstice, about the 21st of June (astronomically the beginning of summer), because in Great Britain summer is considered as beginning with May; specifically, midsummer day, June 24th. See midsummer day, below. On midsummer eve, or the eve of the feast of St. John Baptist (June 24th), it was the custom in former times to kindle fires (called St. John's fires) upon hills in celebration of the summer solstice.

As full of spirit as the month of May,
And gorgeous as the sun at midsummer.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., IV, 1. 102.

"On Midsummer next," the dam'el said.

"Which is June the twenty-four."

midwife (mid'wif), n.: pl. midwives (-wivz). [< ME. midwif, mydwif, midwif, mydwif, mydwif, medwif, medwif, prob. < AS. midwif (not recorded), < mid, with, + wif, wife, woman; cf. Sp. Pg. comadre, a midwife, < com, < L. cum, with, + madre, < L. mater, mother; G. beifrau, a midwife's assistant. Cf. also D. medelhep, assistant, < mede, with, + hep, help; G. mitheifer, an assistant, < mit, with, + heifer, helper. Owing to the disappearance of the prep. mid, this element in midwife has not been commonly understood, and an etymology based on the ME. form medwif, taken as < mede, E. meed, reward, + wif, woman (as if "a woman who serves for pay"), has been in favor. This etymology, which is impossible for other reasons, is not supported even by the ME. form medwif, which is explainable as a mere variant spelling of midwif.] A woman who assists women in childbirth.

The midwife wonder'd, and the women cried
"O, Jesus bless us, he is born with teeth!"
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 4. 74.

migrate (mi-grät), v. t.; pret. and pp. migrated, pp. migrating. [< L. migratus, pp. of migrare, (> It. migrare), move from one place to another, remove, depart, migrate; perhaps connected with meari, go. Cf. emigrate, immigrate.] To pass or remove from one place of residence or habitat to another at a distance, especially from one country or latitude to another; in a general sense, to wander.

Those truly home-bred and genuine sons of the soil who have never migrated beyond the sound of flow bells.

W. Tring, Sketch-Book, p. 379.

Syn. Migrate, Emigrate, Immigrate. To migrate is to change one's abode, especially to a distance or to another country, emphasis being laid upon the change, but not upon the place of departure or that of stopping, and the stay being generally not permanent. Emigrate, to migrate from, views the person as leaving his previous abode and making a new home; immigrate, to migrate into, views him as coming to the new place. The Arab migrants, the European coming to America is an emigrant to those whom he leaves, and an immigrant to the Americans. Migrate is applicable to animals: the other terms are generally used of the movements of men.

migration (mi-grä-shun), n. [< F. migration = Pg. migração = It. migrazione, < L. migratio(n)-, < migrare, pp. migratus, migrate: see migrate.] 1. The act of migrating; change of residence or habitat; removal or transit from one locality or latitude to another, especially at a distance. Among animals, the most extensive and regular migrations are performed by birds during spring and fall, and in a general way along meridians of longitude, the vernal migration being northward, the autumnal southward. This is ordinary or equatorial migration. In cold and temperate latitudes of the northern hemisphere nearly all insectivorous birds perform migration. Some, as sandpipers, which breed only in high latitudes, may be dispersed during their migration over a great part of the world. Others, as swallows, are noted not only for the extent but for the rapidity and regularity of their movements, their arrival and departure being capable of prediction with considerable accuracy. The migration of many water-fowls is scarcely less notable in the same respects. Migration seems to be determined, primarily and chiefly, by conditions of food supply, but this does not fully account for the apparently needless extent and the wonderful periodicity of the movement, nor for the fact that individuals sometimes return to exactly the same spot to breed again, after passing the winter perhaps thousands of miles away. Migrations of mammals are more irregular than those of birds, less definitely related to latitude and longitude, and more obviously dependent upon food supply: such are the excursions, often in enormous herds, of various arctic animals, as lemmings and other rodents, reindeer, musk-oxen, foxes, etc. Such movements do not appear to be specially related to reproduction. Many fishes migrate from and back to the sea, ascending rivers to spawn, as is notably the case with anadromous fishes of the salmon and herring families: with eels the case is reversed, with many fishes the catadromous migration is between deeper and shallower, or colder and warmer, salt water. Periodical migration is also marked with certain insects. Thus, Acrostes plebejus, the milkweed-butterfly, migrates southward in the fall to hibernates in the pine woods of the southern United States. The faculty which enables or compels animals to migrate has been named the "instinct of migration"; but the phrase is rather a statement of fact than an explanation of the phenomenon, except in so far as this instinct may be regarded as originating in and being highly developed from the simple necessity of moving about to secure food.

All our adventures were by the fireside; and all our migrations from the blue bed to the brown.

Goldsmith, Vicar.

(our remote forefathers must have made endless earlier migrations as parts of the great Aryan body, as parts of the smaller Teutonic body. But our voyage from the Low-Dutch mainland to the Isle of Britain was our first migration as a people. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 31.

2. A number of animals migrating together; the total of the individuals or species which perform any particular migration; also, the time or period occupied in migrating.—3†. Change of place; removal.

Such alterations, transitions, migrations, of the centre of gravity, and elevations of new islands, had actually happened. Woodward, Essay towards a Nat. Hist. of the Earth. (Latham.)

4†. Residence in a foreign country; banishment.

We is me, too too long banished from the Christian world, with such animosity, as if it were the worst of enemies, and meet to be adjudged to a perpetual migration.

Sp. Hall, Invisible World, The Epistle.

Bathic migration, migration of fishes from one depth of water to another; vertical or altitudinal change of habitat in the sea: distinguished from equatorial migration.

The fishes of any region may find water of suitable warmth by moving north or south along the shores of the continent, or by changing to waters of lesser or greater depth. The former may be called equatorial, the latter bathic migration. Bathic migration is the most common.

These wild migrators. The New Mirror (1848), II, 121.

migratory (mi-grā-tō-ri), a. [= F. migratoire, = Sp. It. migratorio; as migrate + -ory.] 1. Given to or characterized by migration: roving or removing from place to place; unsettled; as, the pastoral tribes of uncivilized men are generally migratory; to lead a migratory life.

Yet, sweet Nightingale!

From the warm breeze that bears thee out, might

A: will, and stay thy migratory flight.

Wordsworth, Evening Voluntary, v.

The same species is often sedentary in one part of Europe, and migratory in another.

A. R. Wallace, Distribution of Animals, I, 20.

2. Pertaining or relating to migration or to a tendency to migrate.

This purpose is sometimes carried on by a sort of migratory instinct, sometimes by a spirit of conquest.

Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist., II, 2.

Migratory animals, those animals whose instincts prompt them to remove from one place to another at the regularly recurring changes of season or of their natural means of subsistence.—Migratory cells, white blood-corpuscles which, by means of the amoeboid movement of their protoplasm, penetrate the walls of the blood-vessels and wander independently in the tissues, particularly the connective tissue.—Migratory locust. See locust, 1.—Migratory pigeon, the passenger-pigeon. See Pouter, and cut under passenger-pigeon.

migrenet, n. A Middle English form of megrin.

Michaelmas, n. A Middle English form of Michaelmas.

mihrab (mih-rāb'), n. [Ar., praying-place.] A niche, or sometimes merely a decorated slab, in one of the interior walls of a mosque, marking the direction of Mecca, to which the faithful ought to turn in prayer. In the niche a copy of the Koran is usually kept, and in front of it the imam stands when he leads the congregation in prayer.

mihri, mihria. Obsolete forms of mighri, mighri. mikado (mi-kā-dō), n. [Jap., lit. 'exalted gate' (like the Sublime Porte, applied to the Sultan of Turkey), < mi, exalted, + kado, gate.] The Emperor of Japan, sometimes erroneously spoken of as the spiritual emperor. See shogun.

Mikania (mi-kā-ni-ā), n. [NL. (Willdenow), named after J. C. Mikán, a Bohemian botanist (1769-1844).] A genus of composite plants of the suborder Tubuliflorae, the tribe Eupatoriaceae, and the subtribe Ageratoideae. The principal characteristics are an involucre of four slightly unequal bracts, four-flowered heads which are racemose or panicled, and pappus with very numerous scabrous bristles arranged in one row. The plants are shrubs or herbs, which are almost always climbing or twining, with opposite leaves, and small white, flesh-colored, or pale yellowish heads. About 140 species have been enumerated, but they may probably be reduced to 100. They are natives of the warmer parts of America, with the exception of one species, which is found in Asia and tropical Africa. M. scandens, the climbing hempweed, is a high twiner, with cordate somewhat deltoid or hastate leaves and heads of pale flesh-colored flowers in dense cymes, climbing over copse along streams; it ranges through the eastern and southern United States into Mexico and to Brazil. M. Guaco is one of the guaco-plants of tropical America.

mikel, a. and n. A Middle English form of mickle.

mil (mil), n. [< L. mille, a thousand.] A unit of length used in measuring the diameter of wires, equal to .001 of an inch.—Circular mil, a unit of area used in measuring the areas of cross-sections of wires, equal to .7854 of a square mil.

mil. An abbreviation of military.

milager (mi-lāj), n. See milage.

Milanese (mil-an-ēs' or -ez'), a. and n. [< It. Milanese (< L. Mediolanensis).] < Milano, < L. Mediolanum, the city now called Milan. I. a. Of or belonging to Milan or the people of Milan, a city of northern Italy, or to the province or the former duchy of Milan.

milarete (mil'ar-ē-tē), n. [< Milar (the Val Milar, in Switzerland, where it was supposed to occur; the true locality, however, has been found to be Val Gurf) + -ite.] A silicate of aluminum and calcium, allied in composition to petalite. It occurs in colorless or greenish hexagonal (perhaps pseudohexagonal) prisms.

milcer, v. t. See milce.

milch (milch), a. [< ME. milche, milch, < AS. meles, meles, meolce (= L. melke = OHG. milg, meles, G. melk = Lecl. melk, mjolki).] Giving milk; furnishing milk; as, a milch cow; now applied only to domestic animals, and chiefly to cows. Take two milch kine, on which there hath come my yoke. 1 Sam. vi, 7.

2†. Milky; said of plants.

Heem (plants) both milch in year novellas gine
Beth bought to feed.

Pulladun, Husbandrie (E. E. 18) p. 99.

3†. Yielding liquid; distilling drops (namely, tears). [< poetical and rare.]

The instant burst of clamour that she made,
Unless things mortal move them not at all,
Would have made milk the burning eyes of heaven,
And passion in the gods. Shak., Hamlet, II, 2, 640.

milch-wench (milch'wench), n. A wet-nurse.

Such exceptions were made against all but one country milch-wench, to whom I was committed, and put to the breast. Steele, Tatler, No. 15.

milch-woman (milch'wūm'an), n. A wet-nurse. [Rare.]

We find not above fifty one to have been starved, excepting helpless infants at Nurse, . . . being caused . . . by carelessness, ignorance, and infirmity of the Milch women. J. Grant, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 109.

milchy (mil'chi), a. [< milch + -y.] Cf. milky. 1. Milk-giving; abounding in milk.

There milchy goats came freely to the pail.
Shak., Hamlet, II, 1 (Olen of Horace, Epode, xvi (Darius)).

2. Milky, as an oyster.

mild (mild), a. [*< ME. mild, milde, myld, < AS. milde = OS. milda = OFries. milde = D. mild = MLG. mild = OHG. milfi, MHG. milte, G. mild, milde, mild = Lecl. mildr = Sw. Shak., Rich. III, 1, 2, 104.

2. Exercising gentleness in conduct or action; not harsh or unfeeling; considerate; conciliatory.

To smooth his fault I should have been more mild.

Shak., Rich. II, 1, 3, 240.

3. Marked by softness or kindness; gentle in character, method, or appearance; manifesting or expressing mildness; mollifying; tranquil; placid; as, mild words or manners; a mild rebuke; a mild aspect.

Rushing sound

Of onset ended soon each milder thought.

Milton, P. L., vi, 98.

Ab! dearest friend! in whom the gods had joined
The mildest manners with the bravest mind.

Pope, Ham., xiv, 988.

4. Gentle or moderate in force, operation, or effect; not harsh or irritating; emollient; bland; genial; as, mild medicine; mild winds; a mild remedy.

The folding gates diffused a silver light,
And with a milder gleam refreshed the sight.

Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., II.

5. Moderate in quality or degree; of mitigated force; weak in kind; free from harshness or roughness; hence, not hard to endure, manage, etc.; as, mild fruit; mild dissipation; mild efforts.

This horror will grow mild, this darkness light.

Milton, P. L., II, 290.

O! pass more innocent, in infant state,
To the mild limbs of our father Tane.

Pope, Dunciad, I, 228.

Upon a mild docility of bill.

Byron, Child Harold, IV, 67.

Modena, Roman, and Sardinian (oak) are what the workmen call milder in character—that is to say, they are easier to work, and a little less hard. Lodgett, Timber, p. 84.

6. Hence, new; not having gained the taste that comes by keeping; said of malt liquors; as, mild ale.—7. See the quotation.

A body which can have its form permanently changed without any flaw or break taking place is called mild. Encyc. Brit., VI, 312.

[Mild forms the first element in a number of compounds of obvious signification, for example, mild flavored, mild looking, mild mannered, mild spirited, mild tempered.] Mild steel. See steel. To draw it mild. See draw.—Syn. Bland, Soft, etc. (see gentle), tranquil, soothing, pleasant, pacific.

mildt (mild), n. [< ME. milde (= OHG. milfi = Lecl. milch, milde, mildness; < mild, a.)] Mildness; gentleness.

Phy on the cruel crabb'd heart

Which was not mov'd with mildt

Guinevere, Complaint of Philomena (ed. Arber).

mildt, v. [ML., < AS. mildian, become mild (cf. gumildian, gemildian, make mild, pity; see mitse), < milde, mild; see mild, a.] I. intrans. To become mild.

II. trans. 1. To make merciful.—2. To pity; pardon. Hallwell.

milden (mild'n), v. [= Dan. mildne; as mild + -en.] I. intrans. To become mild; grow less severe, stringent, or intense; soften; as, the weather gradually mildens. Imp. Dict.

II. trans. To render mild, in any sense; make less severe, stringent, or intense; soften.

The first element is disputed, the word having early perished in independent use; but no other explanation than that here given is plausible.] 1. A minute parasitic fungus which frequently appears on the leaves, stems, and various other parts of plants or other decaying organic substances as a white frost-like down, or in spots or with various discolorations. The name is more properly restricted to the Erysiphe, or powdery mildews, and the Peronosporae, or downy mildews. The Uredineae, of which Puccinia graminis, the common mildew of England, is the type, are more properly rusts. (See rust, Erysiphe.) The mildews are among the most destructive fungi known. Peronospora viticola is the very destructive American downy mildew of the grape, and Uromyces ampelopsidis, of which the so-called Indian Tucker is the conical form, is the powdery mildew of the grape. Phytophthora infestans is the downy mildew of the potato, causing the disease known as potato-blight. Erysiphe communis is a very common mildew on various Leguminosae, Ranunculaceae, etc. The so-called mildew of linen is produced by a species of Cladophorium. See Cladophorium, Erysiphe, Peronospora.

The Downy Mildew of the Grape (Peronospora viticola), magnified.

2. A state of decay produced in living and dead vegetable matter, and in some manufactured products of vegetable matter, such as cloth and paper, by the ravages of very minute parasitic fungi.

The Lord shall smite thee . . . with mildew.

Doct. xxviii. 22.
One talks of mildew and of frost.
Cooper, Yearly Distress.

Mildew mortification, gangrenous ergotism.
mildew (mīl'dū), v. [< mildew, n.] I. trans. To faint with mildew.

He . . . mildews the white wheat, and hurts the poor creature of earth.
Shak., Lear, III. 4. 123.

It distills . . . books at the Custom House till the pages are mildewed.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xvi.

II. intrans. To become affected with mildew.
mildew-bronze (mīl'dū-bronz), n. Bronze in which is imitated the effect of aging on bronzes long buried in the ground.

mildewy (mīl'dū-i), a. [< mildew + -y.] Affected by or abounding in mildew; moldy.

mildness (mīl'dnes), n. [< ME. mīldenes, < AS. mīldenes* (= OHG. mīltutesa), < mīlde, mīld: see mīld and -ness.] The state or quality of being mild, in any sense of that word; gentleness of disposition, manner, action, or effect; moderateness of quality or character; placidity; softness; yieldingness.

mild-spoken (mīl'dspō'kn), a. Mild in speech. [Colloq.]

mile (mīl), n. [< ME. mīle, mīle, < AS. mīl = D. mīl = MLat. mīle, Lat. mīle = OHG. mīla, mīlla, MIHG. mīle, G. mīle = Ice. mīla = Sw. Dan. mīl = OF. mīle, mīle, F. mīle = Pr. Sp. mīla = Pg. mīla = It. mīlia, < ML. mīlia, mīlia, fem. sing., a mile, < L. mīle, see passuum, a mile, lit. a thousand steps; mīle, pl. mīlia, mīlia, a thousand, passuum, gen. pl. of passus, a step: see pace.] An itinerary measure, modified from that of the Romans, which was equal to 1,617 English yards: used in the British empire, in the United States, and, formerly, in most European countries. The ordinary statute mile is equal to 8 furlongs = 320 perches or poles = 1,760 yards = 5,280 feet: it was rendered legal by a statute of the thirty-fifth year of Elizabeth's reign, which prohibited building within three miles of London. This mile was probably intended to be about the length of a minute on the earth's surface, but the perch, of which it is an exact multiple, already existed. The square mile is a square chain, or 640 acres. The nautical or geographical mile has been variously defined: see phrase below. The medieval English mile (divided into 5 furlongs) was equal to 3,610 feet or 901 meters. The old London mile was 3,000 feet. The miles of continental Europe were of the most various lengths, and mostly represented as it would seem, multiples of some modified Roman mile. The ancient Scottish mile was 1,370 yards = 1,123 English miles; the Irish mile, 2,240 yards = 1,753 English miles (11 Irish miles being 14 English miles). The Welsh mile was nearly 4 miles English. The following table shows the values of some of the principal miles in meters:

Italian Miles.	Meters.	German Miles--continued.	Meters.
Reggio	1,403	Hanover	7,419
Modena	1,400	Saxony	9,082
Genoa	1,495	Brunswick	7,419

Your soul flies in a mile a.

Shak., W. T., iv. 2 (song).

He had ridden five Statute miles

Robin Hood's Part (Child's Ballads, V. 349).

Geographical or nautical mile, a mile variously defined as: (1) the mean length of a minute of latitude = 6,082.66 feet; (2) the length of a minute of the meridian corresponding to the radius of curvature of the particular latitude, varying from 6,045.16 feet at the equator to 6,107.86 feet at the poles; and (3) the length of a minute of longitude on the equator = 6,087.15 feet. To remove all uncertainty, the United States Coast Survey has adopted the value of the nautical mile as equal to one sixtieth part of the length of a degree on the great circle of a sphere whose surface is equal to the surface of the earth. This value gives one nautical mile = 6,080.27 feet, which is very nearly the value of the Admiralty knot (2,028 feet) adopted by the British Hydrographic Office. Three-mile limit, belt, or zone (also called the marine belt, in international law, that part of the margin of the high seas which is within the jurisdiction of the nation possessing the coast, originally determined by the circumstance that, at the time this limit became generally recognized, a marine league approximated fairly to the distance at which cannon on the shore would serve to command the water. 1 Wart. Dig. Int. Law, III, § 32.

mileage (mī'lāj), n. [Formerly also milage; < mīle + -age.] 1. Length, extent, or distance in miles; the total or aggregate number of miles of way made, used, or traversed; as, the mileage of highways or waterways in a country; the mileage of a railroad-line; the mileage of a year's traffic on a railroad, or of travel through a country. -- 2. An allowance or compensation for travel or conveyance reckoned by the mile; especially, payment allowed to a public functionary for the expenses of travel in the discharge of his duties according to the number of miles passed over; as, the mileage of a sheriff, circuit judge, or member of Congress or of a legislature.

Private travelers can obtain permission to make use of (post horses) on payment of small mileage dues.
H. O. Forbes Eastern Archipelago, p. 52.

mile-post (mīl'pōst), n. A post set up to mark distance by miles along a highway or other line of travel.

Milesia (mīl'si-ā), n. [NL.] A genus of dipterous insects of the family Syrphidae, founded by Latreille in 1805. It is composed of large, robust, nearly naked species, black or yellowish brown, with yellowish thoracic and abdominal markings. The genus is mostly developed in southern Asia and the East Indian archipelago; but two European species are known, and one, M. ornata, is North American.

Milesian (mī-lēs-i-ān), n. [NL.] A genus of dipterous insects of the family Syrphidae, founded by Latreille in 1805. It is composed of large, robust, nearly naked species, black or yellowish brown, with yellowish thoracic and abdominal markings. It is distributed throughout the northern hemisphere, and is found on roadsides, in dry pastures, etc. It is a grayish green plant, a foot or two high, the leaves bipinnate and very finely divided, the heads in a crowded corymb, their short rays white, sometimes rose-colored. Medicinally the milfoil is a mild aromatic tonic and astringent. A. monacha, the monk-milfoil, a native of the mountains of central and southern Europe, is cultivated in Switzerland as a food for cattle. The name is sometimes extended to other plants of the genus. -- Water-milfoil, one of various water-plants with finely dissected leaves, chiefly of the genus Myriophyllum. The hooded water-milfoil is the bladderwort, Utricularia vulgaris.

milias, n. [L., pl. of milium: see Milium.] Millet; millet-seed.

They stamp their milias as we do spics, . . . temper with fresh water and salt, and make rolls thereof.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 650.

miliari, n. [< ME. miliare, < L. miliarium (see def.)] In Rom. antiq. and later, a tall narrow vessel for drawing and warming water: used in baths.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 40.

miliaria (mī-lī-ā-ri-ā), n. [NL., < L. miliaria, fem. of miliarius, belonging to millet: see miliari.] 1. In pathol., miliary fever. -- 2. In ornith., an old name of the corn-bunting, Emberiza miliaria, as that of a bird which feeds upon millet. It is taken by some authors as a generic name of this bunting and its near relatives.

miliary (mī-lī-ā-ri), a. [= F. miliare = Sp. Pg. miliar = It. miliare, < L. miliarius, of or belonging to millet, < mīlium, millet: see mīl.] Resembling millet-seeds, especially in size (about one or two millimeters in diameter); accompanied by formations of this size; as, miliary glands; miliary tuberculous; miliary fever. See gland, tuberculosis, fever.

millicet (mī-lēs'), n. [< F. mīluc, militia: see militia.] Militia, in a general sense.

The two-and-twentieth of the prince's age is the time assigned by their constitutions for his entering upon the public charges of their millicet.

Sir W. Temple, War in the Low Countries.

Millobatis, n. See Myliobatis.

Miliola (mī-lī-ō-lā), n. [NL., < L. mīlium, millet: see Milium.] A genus of imperforate foraminifera, typical of the family Miliolidae. The minute fossil tests or shells occur in immense numbers in some strata, being the chief constituent of the miliolite limestone of the Paris basin, for example.

Miliolidae (mī-lī-ō-lā-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Miliola + -idae.] A family of foraminiferous rhizopods, typified by the genus Miliola. They have the test imperforate, normally calcareous and porcelaneous, sometimes incrustated with sand, under starved conditions (for example in brackish water) becoming chitinous or chitino-arenaceous, and at abyssal depths occasionally consisting of a thin, homogeneous, imperforate siliceous film.

milioliform (mī-lī-ō-lī-fōrm), a. [< NL. Miliola + L. forma, form.] Same as milioline.

milioline (mī-lī-ō-līn), a. [< NL. Miliola + -ine.] Pertaining to, characteristic of, or resembling the Miliolidae or a subfamily Miliolina: as, a milioline chamber or character.

Abounding near the shores of almost every sea are some forms of the Miliolina type, so named from the resemblance of some of their minute fossilized forms to millet-seeds.
W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 402.

miliolite (mī-lī-ō-līt), a. and n. [< NL. Miliola + -ite.] 1. a. Miliolitic.

2. n. A fossil milioline foraminifer.

miliolitic (mī-lī-ō-līt'ik), a. [< miliolite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to miliolites, containing or consisting of miliolites: as, miliolitic chalk.

milit. An abbreviation of military.

militancy (mī-lī-ān-sī), n. [< militant (t) + -cy.] The condition of being militant; a state of warfare or conflict.

Miliolite.

All humane life, especially the active part, is constituted in a state of continual militancy.

W. Montague, Devout Essays, I, x. 7.

It is not uncheering to look back upon a time when the nation (England) was in a normal condition of militancy against social injustice.

Proverbs, Sketches, p. 172.

militant (mil'i-tant), a. [= F. militant = Sp. Pg. il. militante, < L. militans (-t-s), ppr. of militare, serve as a soldier; see militate.] 1. Fighting; warring; engaged in warfare; pertaining to warfare or conflict.

At which command the powers militant

... moved on Milton, P. L., vi. 61.

In silence.

2. Having a combative character or tendency; warlike.

The militant nature of legal protection is seen in the fact that . . . it is a replacing of individual armed force by the armed force of the state, always in reserve if not exercised.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 522.

Church militant. See church.

militantly (mil'i-tant-li), adv. In a militant or warlike manner.

military (mil'i-tär), a. [< L. militaria; see military.] Military.

Although he were a prince in military virtue approved, Hacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

Instruct the noble English heirs

In political and military affairs.

B. Jonson, Underwoods, 1211

militarily (mil'i-tär-ri-li), adv. In a military or warlike manner; by military force; from a military point of view.

Austria is at this moment, under the treaty (of 1850), militarily occupying two provinces of Turkey in order to reform them.

N. A. Rev., CXXVII, 396.

militarism (mil'i-tär-izm), n. [= F. militarisme = Sp. militarismo; as militar, militar-y, + -ism.] The military spirit; addition to war or military practices; the maintenance of national power by means of standing armies.

The principles of Port Royal found some supporters . . . before monarchism and militarism had crushed the life out of the nation.

Encyc. Brit., VII, 675.

Monarchy, aristocracy, militarism we could not have if we would, we would not have if we could.

A. D. White, Century's Message, p. 19.

Who can say that the democracy will not in some sudden impulse of economy or aversion to militarism prematurely reduce the army and navy, and lay the Empire open to aggression from every side?

Nineteenth Century, XX, 311.

militarist (mil'i-tär-ist), n. [= F. militariste, + -ist.] 1. One devoted to military affairs; one proficient in the art of war.

You're deceived, my lord; this is Monsieur Parolles, the gallant militarist—that was his own phrase—that had the whole theory of war in the knot of his scarf, and the practice in the chape of his dagger.

Shak., All's Well, iv. 3, 101.

2. One who is in favor of a standing army; one who advocates a warlike policy.

military (mil'i-tär-i), a. and n. [Formerly also militar; = F. militaire = Sp. Pg. militar = It. militare, < L. militaris, rarely militarius, of or belonging to soldiers or war, warlike, < miles (milit-), OL. meiles, a soldier.] 1. a. 1. Having the position or character of a soldier; pertaining to soldiers; suitable to, characteristic of, or performed by soldiers; soldierly: as, a military man; a military department or disposition.

He will maintain his argument as well as any military man in the world.

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 2, 80.

Was this your discipline and faith engaged,

Your military obedience?

Milton, P. L., iv. 955.

Though courageous in brawls and duels, he knew nothing of military duty.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. Relating or pertaining to war, to the art of war, or to an armed force; adapted to or connected with a state of war; martial; warlike; belligerent: as, the military art; military glory; military history; military equipage; a military expedition. The military resources of a country include both army and navy, and the phrase military office has been legally construed to apply to both; but in ordinary language military is used only in relation to the land-foree, as distinguished from the naval or sea forcee.

Both were ambitious of military glory, and showed capacity for attaining it.

Prescott, Ferd. and Ism., ii. 25.

A military force, whether intended to operate on land or at sea, exists primarily for purposes of war.

J. R. Soley, Blockade and Cruisers, p. 231.

3. Warlike in method or practice; having relation to the usages or purposes of war; connected with or dependent upon the use of armed force: opposed to civil: as, a military despotism; military government; a military execution.

Warlike, etc.* See martial.

II. n. Soldiers generally; soldiery; officers of the army; commonly with the definite article: as, the occasion was enlivened by the presence of the military.

My lord going to the "Trumpet," in the Cockpit, Whitehall, an house used by the military in his time as a young man.

Thackeray, Henry Esmond, I, 14.

militate (mil'i-tat), v. t. & p. prot. and pp. militated, ppr. militating. [< L. militatus, pp. of militare, (> It. militare = Pg. Sp. militar = F. militier), be a soldier, < miles (milit-), a soldier; see military.] 1. To be in conflict or at variance; come into collision.

Against everything which militated with the doctrines or ceremonies of his church, he hurled his anathemas.

Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II, 90.

Hence—2. To stand in array; have weight or force, as in determining anything: followed by against, and permissibly by in favor of: as, these facts militate against (or in favor of) your theory.

Multiplicity of talents has too often militated against the due fulfillment of some special bent.

W. Sharp, D. G. Rossetti, p. 1.

militation (mil-i-tä'shon), n. [< L. as if militatio* (-n-), < militare, pp. militans, serve as a soldier; see militate.] A fighting; warfare; state of conflict.

Repentance, death not cut down sin at a blow; no, it is a constant militation, a course of mortification.

The Morning Exercise Methodized, p. 374 militia (mi-lish'ä), n. [Formerly milice, < F. milice = Sp. Pg. milicia = It. milizia, < L. militia, military service, the soldiery, < miles (milit-), a soldier.] 1. Military service; warfare.

Another kind of militia I had then there.

Baxter.

2. Soldiery; militants collectively. [Rare.]

Know then, unnumber'd spirits round thee fly,

The light militia of the lower sky.

Pope, R. of the L., l. 42.

Hence—3. The whole body of men declared by law amenable to military service, without enlistment, whether armed and drilled or not. [U. S.]

It has been necessary to call into review, not only volunteers, but also portions of the militia of the States by draft.

Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 34a.

The regular army is supported and controlled by the federal government, but each state maintains its own militia, which it is bound to use in case of internal disturbance before calling upon the central government for aid. In time of war, however, these militia come under the control of the central government.

J. Fisher, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 28.

4. A body of men enrolled and drilled according to military law, as an armed force, but not as regular soldiers, and called out in emergency for actual service and periodically for drill and exercise. The feudal array of the middle ages was properly a militia, and the first proceeding of modern warfare consisted in the gradual adoption of permanent and regular troops, which superseded the militia.

militiaman (mi-lish'ä-man), n.; pl. militiamen (-men). (One who belongs to the organized and armed militia.)

militiate (mi-lish'ä-ti), v. t. [< militia + -at. Cf. militate.] 1. To levy or raise troops; maintain a standing army.

We continue to militate, and to raise light troops.

Walpole, To Mann, Nov. 16, 1744. (Davies.)

2. To fight as a soldier.

The militating spirits of my country.

Steele, Tristram Shandy, III, 177. (Davies.)

Milium (mil'i-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. milium, millet; see millet.] 1. A genus of grasses of the tribe Agrostideae and the subtribe Stipeae, characterized by an ovoid glume, rigid or hardened about the caryopsis, and an awnless flowering glume. They are annuals or perennials, with flat leaves and a compound panicle of one-flowered spikelets. There are 5 or 6 species, natives of Europe, temperate Asia, and North America. The genus bears the common name of millet-grass. M. efusum, widely spread through the northern hemisphere, is a tall handsome grass which thrives in dense shade. Its herbage is relished by cattle, and its seed by birds.

They have the seed of Milium in great abundance.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 104.

2. [i. e.] In pathol., an affection of the sebaceous glands, caused by retention of their secretion in the form of pearly or yellowish-white little globular bodies embedded in the skin and projecting slightly above its surface.

Milium is a minute white tumour, about the size of a millet seed, . . . which is mostly situated at or near the free edge of the lid.

J. S. Wells, Dis. of Eye, p. 482.

Milusa (mil-i-ä'sä), n. [NL. (Leachmann, 1832), named after J. Milus Vololinus, a horticultural writer of the 16th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Anonaceae, the custard-apple family, type of the tribe Miluseae. It is characterized by having the outside petals small, and the interior ones much larger, flat, and converging at the apex. Seven or eight species are known, natives of eastern India, and perhaps of Australia. They are low or medium-sized trees, with flowers almost always axillary, either solitary or in clusters, and with the petals often transparent.

Miluseae (mil-i-ä'sä-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Benth and Hooker, 1832), < Milusa + -ae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Anonaceae, typified by the genus Milusa. It is characterized by stamens which are loosely imbricated, and with the connective slightly or not at all dilated beyond the conspicuous dorsal cells of the anthers. There are 11 genera and about 65 species, all indigenous to the tropics.

milk (milk), n. [< ME. milk, mylk, melk, mule, < AS. meole, meoluc (not mile*) = OFries. melok = D. mel = M.G. läl, melk = OHG. miluh, MHG. milch, milch, G. milch = Teut. mylk = Sw. mylk = Dan. melk = Goth. miluka, milk; cf. Ir. melg = O'Bulg. melko = Pol. Bohem. melko = Serv. miljko = Russ. moloko = Wendish moloko, melanda (all prob. borrowed from or modified according to the Teut., having k for the reg. g) (cf. W. laeth, L. lac (-t-) = Gr. gala (galaer-), milk, of diff. origin; see lactate, etc., galaxy, etc.); derived from a common Indo-Eur. verb, namely, AS. melean (pret. meale, pp. meolen) = D. melken = M.G. läl, melken = OHG. melchan, MHG. melchen, melken, G. melken = Goth. milkan* (not recorded), a strong verb partly displaced by, or merged in, a later weak verb, F. milk = OFries. melka = Teut. mylka, etc., depending on the noun; cf. O'Bulg. milza, meleat, etc., = Russ. melch = Lith. melsti = L. mulgere = Gr. gala (-galaer-), milk, = Skt. √marj = Zend √marez, stroke, rub. Hence milk, v., and milch, a.] 1. A white or bluish-white liquid secreted by the mammary glands of the females of the class Mammalia, and drawn from their breasts for the nourishment of their young. It is opaque, with a slight peculiar odor and a bland sweetish taste. Its chemical constituents in different mammals are qualitatively alike, but quantitatively vary much, not only in different species, but also in different individuals, or even at different times in the same individual. The amount of water varies from about 80 to 90 per cent., the residue being composed of albuminoids (casein and lactoprotein), fat, milk-sugar, and certain salts, chiefly phosphates. Under the microscope it appears as a clear transparent fluid, in which a large number of minute globules are suspended. When allowed to rest, these globules rise to the surface, forming a yellowish stratum cremæ, which consists mainly of the fat, mixed with some casein, and retaining some serum. In the cow about 4 per cent. of the milk is cream, in the human female less, in the mare scarcely more than 1 per cent. By churning, the globules unite to form butter, leaving the buttermilk, which is essentially a solution of milk-sugar, with the salts and some casein and butter. The milk from which cream is separated is skinned milk, which when left to itself (if not too cold) develops, from the action of a certain bacterium, the acid which separates the casein in a coagulated condition called curd; the same effect is produced by some other acids and by rennet. The prepared inner membrane of the stomach of a calf. The liquid separated from the coagulum is called whey, and contains chiefly milk-sugar and some salts. Cheese is prepared by coagulating milk with rennet, allowing the whey to separate, and adding salt to the curd. The specific gravity of both cows and human milk is about 1.030. Human milk is always alkaline, cow's milk either alkaline or acid, while the milk of carnivora is always acid. Milk represents a complete or typical food, in which all the constituents necessary for maintaining the life and growth of the body are present. In rare instances milk, in greater or less abundance is secreted by the mammary glands of the adult human male.

*Milk before wine, I would twice mine.
Milk taken after, in poisonous daughter Quoted in Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), Index, p. 100.
She bath'd her body many a time

Queen Eleanor's Fall (Child's Ballads, VII 257).*

2. Anything resembling milk in appearance, taste, etc., as the juice of the coconut and the sap of certain plants (see later).

*Thou (squills) that in hills growe or place colds
Have little milk*

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 124.

At the time when the contents of the berry (wheat) are in the condition technically known as milk

Ure, Dict., IV. 153.

3. The spot before it is discharged from an oyster.—4. A slight cloudy opacity occurring in some diamonds.

Cloudy imperfections known in the trade as "milk" or "milk"

Ure, Dict., II. 24.

Blue milk. (a) Milk deprived of its cream; skimmed milk. It has a faint bluish tinge. [Colloq.] (b) Milk which has undergone a special fermentation caused by a microbe, Bacterium cynogenum, which causes it to assume a blue color. Bristol milk, a mixed beverage of which sherry is the chief ingredient.

Plenty of brave wine, and above all Bristol milk.

Pope, Diary.

A rich beverage made of the best Spanish wine, and colored about the whole kingdom as Bristol milk.

Munday, Hist. Eng., III.

Condensed milk, milk preserved by the addition of sugar with or without other ingredients, and subsequent reduction by evaporation to a half or a fourth of its bulk, sometimes even to dryness. Fairy's milk, a peculiar milky secretion produced by the mammary glands of infants for some days after birth. In milk, in the milk, milky; containing the spot, as oysters; containing a white juice, as wheat before the grains harden. Milk of almonds, an emulsion prepared by rubbing blanched almonds with gum arabic, sugar, and water. Milk of lime, slaked lime suspended in water; so called as resembling milk in appearance. Milk of sulphur, precipitated sulphur. Pigeon's milk, a milky or curdy secretion of the crop of pigeons of both sexes, upon which they feed their young for some time by disgorging or regurgitating it into their mouths. Red milk, milk which has assumed a red color from the growth of a chromogenic fungus, Micrococcus profligator. Sugar of milk. Same as lactose. Whole milk, milk with all its cream. [Eng.] Yellow milk, milk which has assumed a yellow color, due to a coloring matter produced by a microbe, Bacterium sporanthum.

milk (milk), v. t. [< ME. milken, < AS. mlecan = OFries. melka (= leol), mjolka = Sw. mjölka = Dan. mælke], draw milk, give milk, < meole, milk; see uik, n., where an earlier form of the verb is mentioned.] 1. To press or draw milk from the breasts or udders of: as, to milk a cow.

The Jew may not milk his calf, nor ate of the milk when he hath procured a Christian to milk them, except he first buy it, but at his own price.

Purchar, Pilgrimage, p. 205.

Thou wilt not find my shepherdesses idly piping on oaten reeds, but milking the kine

Guy, Shepherd's Week, Prologue.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, iv. 8.

Abstaining from flesh and milk-meats on Friday.

N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, p. 274.

milk-mirror (milk'nir'ör), n. Certain marks on the udder and perineum of the cow, consisting of spots and lines on which the hair grows upward (the hair on other parts growing downward), supposed to indicate, by their form, size, and direction, the characters of the cow as regards both the quantity and the quality of her milk.

milk-mite (milk'mit), n. See cheese-mite.

milk-molar (milk'inö'läär), n. One of the grinders of back teeth of the milk-dentition, corresponding to and replaced by a premolar of the permanent dentition.

milk-nurse (milk'nērs), n. A wet-nurse.

My mother was a guide milk-nurse,
And a guide nurse was she.
Barry Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 396).

milk-pail (milk'pāl), n. A pail for holding milk; specifically, the wooden or tin vessel commonly used in milking.

Very fractious, and apt to kick over the milk-pail.
Quarterly Rev., CLXV. 149.

milk-pan (milk'pan), n. A large shallow pan in which milk is kept to allow the cream to rise.

milk-pap (milk'pap), n. A teat or nipple. [Rare.]

Let not the virgin's cheek
Make soft thy trenchant sword; for those milk paps,
That through the window-lane bore at men's eyes,
Are not within the leaf of pity writ.
Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 115.

milk-parsley (milk'pārs'li), n. A European umbelliferous plant, Peucedanum palustre, abounding with an acrid milky juice; also, Scellinum caruifolium of the same family, sometimes distinguished as caraway-leaved milk-parsley.

milk-pea (milk'pē), n. See Galactia, 2.

milk-plasma (milk'plaz'mil), n. A clear slightly opalescent fluid obtained by filtering milk through clay filters or membranes.

milk-porridge (milk'por'ij), n. Porridge made with milk instead of water.

milk-pump (milk'pump), n. An instrument for drawing milk from the breasts; a breast-pump.

milk-punch (milk'punch'), n. A drink made of milk, spirits (usually brandy, rum, or whiskey), sugar, and nutmeg.

"I don't know," replied Mr. Pickwick, with equal carelessness; "it smells, I think, like milk punch."

Dickens, Pickwick, I.

milk-quartz (milk'kwārt's), n. A variety of quartz of a milk-white color. Also called milky quartz.

milk-scab (milk'skab), n. Same as milk-blotch.

milk-selet, n. [ME.] A milk-pail.

Multatule, a milk-selet. Nominate MS. (Halliwell.)

milk-shake (milk'shak'), n. A beverage composed of milk and carbonated water with the addition of a flavoring, mixed by being vigorously shaken up and down by hand or by a small machine. [Recent, U. S.]

milk-sick (milk'siki), a. Infected with milk-sickness. [Colloq.]

Trembles and milk-sickness were generally hard to locate by strangers in the particular "settlement," as a "milk sick farm" was not desirable as a place of residence, and, if known to be such, was rendered almost unsalable.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 9.

milk-sickness (milk'sik nes), n. A malignant disease, occurring in some parts of the United States, which affects certain kinds of farm stock, and also persons who eat the flesh or dairy products of cattle so infected. The symptoms are vomiting, purging, extreme nervous agitation, etc. From the peculiar tremors that characterize it, it is also called the trembler.

milk-snake (milk'snāk), n. A handsome and harmless serpent, Ophibolus zinnus, of the family Colubridæ, common in many parts of the United States. It attains a length of about 3 feet, the coloration is yellowish-gray, with a dorsal series of 50 or more elliptical chocolate black bordered blotches, and on each side two other alternating series of blotches; the abdomen is yellowish-white with square black blotches. It is also called chicken snake and thunder and lightning snake.

milk-sop (milk'sop), n. [ME. milk-sopp; < milk, n., + sop, n.] 1. A piece of bread soaked in milk. [Rare.]—2. A soft, effeminate, girlish man; one who is devoid of manliness; a term of contempt.

Alas! she saith, that ever I was shape
To wed a milk-sop or a coward ape Chaucer, Prologue to Monk's Tale, l. 22.

'Tis now come to that pass that he is no gentleman, a very milk-sop, a clown, of no bringing up, that will not drink.
Burton, Anat. of Mel, p. 143.

milk-sopism (milk'sop-izm), n. [ME. milk-sop + -ism.] The character of a milk-sop; effeminacy. Noctes Ambrosianæ, Sept., 1832. [Rare.]

milkstone (milk'stōn), n. A white calcined flint, often found in connection with prehistoric remains. They are supposed to have been repeatedly heated in order to be thrown into water to make it boil, at a time when pottery vessels were not made to resist the action of fire.

milk-sugar (milk'shūg'ār), n. Same as lactose.

milk-tester (milk'tes'ter), n. A lactometer or lactodensimeter. See tester.

milk-thistle (milk'this'tl), n. A thistle-like plant, Silybum (Cardus) Marianum, native in southern Europe, somewhat cultivated and spontaneous elsewhere. The leaves are variegated with white. Sometimes called lady's-thistle.

milk-thrush (milk'thrush), n. In pathol. See aphtha.

milk-tie (milk'ti), n. Same as milk-kinship.

The strength of the foster-feeding, the milk tie, among the Scotch Highlanders is a familiar instance of a mode of regarding relationship very different from that prevalent among us.
Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilization, p. 145.

milk-tooth (milk'tōth), n. [= D. milktand = G. milchzahn = Sw. mjölk tand = Dan. melketand.] A tooth of the milk-dentition; a temporary or deciduous tooth, which is shed and replaced. A child has 20 milk-teeth.

milk-tree (milk'trē), n. 1. Same as coc-tree (Brosimum galactodendron).—2. A tree of one of several other genera, as Tabernaemontana ulmis, of British Guiana. Jamaica milk-tree, or milk wood, Pseudodelphinium spurius. Madagascar milk-tree, Cerbera Odallam. See Cerbera.

milk-tube (milk'tub), n. In bot., a laticiferous tube.

milk-vat, milk-fat (milk'vat, -fat), n. [ME. milk-fat, < AS. meolefat (= D. MLG. melkvat = OHG. milchfatz, MHG. milchfatz, G. milchfass = Sw. mjölk fat = Dan. melkefad), a vessel for milk, < meole, milk, + fat, vessel; see fat, vat.] A tank or tub into which milk is poured, especially for coagulating with rennet, in the manufacture of cheese.

milk-vessel (milk'ves'el), n. In bot., one of the tubes in which a milky fluid is secreted; a laticiferous vessel.

milk-vetch (milk'vech), n. A plant of the genus Astragalus; so called from a belief that these plants increased the secretion of milk in goats feeding upon them.

milk-walk (milk'wāk), n. A round or beat for selling milk; a milkman's route. [Eng.]

"My father had a milk-walk," he said, and when he died I was without money and had nothing to do.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 486.

milk-warm (milk'wārm), a. Warm as milk as it comes from the breast or udder.

They had baths of cool water for the summer, but in general they used it milk warm.
Snodgrass, France and Italy, xxxii. (Dames.)

milkweed (milk'wēd), n. 1. A general name for plants of the genus Asclepias, somewhat especially for A. Coralli, the most common American species; so called from their milky juice. The bast of A. Coralli forms a tough textile fiber. The swamp milkweed, A. incarnata, is another common species, with rather handsome flesh-colored flowers. Also called milkwed. 2. A plant of the genus Euphorbia, especially E. corollata, the flowering or blooming spurge. See Euphorbia.—3. In Great Britain: (a) The sow-thistle, Trichos dactyloides. (b) The milk-pursh, Puccinellia palustris. Green milkweed, a plant of the genus Asclepias and perhaps Asclepias both closely allied to Asclepias.

milk-white (milk'hwīt), a. [ME. milkwhit, melkwhit, < AS. meolewhit, white as milk, < meole, milk, + whit, white.] White as milk.
A little western flower,
Before milk white, now purple with love's wound,
And maidens call it love in idleness.
Shak., M. A. D., v. 1. 167.

milk-woman (milk'wūm'wōn), n. A wet nurse. [Scotch.]

milkwood (milk'wūd), n. A name of several trees of different genera. (a) The Jamaica milk tree, Pseudodelphinium spurius. (b) A West Indian species, Lawsonia inermis, called henna and henna wood. (c) A very milky euphorbiaceous tree, Sapota Linnæa (var. elliptica), called Jamaica milkwood.

milkwort (milk'wōrt), n. 1. A plant of the genus Polypogon, formerly imagined to increase the milk of nurses. In Great Britain the common milkwort is P. vulgaris, also called crane flower, gum flower, and proserpin, and proserpin flower, in allusion to its time of blooming at 4 us. 2. A seaside plant, Glaux maritima, with the same supposed property. Also called sea milkwort.

milky (mil'ki), a. [ME. milky, < mil, n., + -y.] 1. Containing, consisting of, or resembling milk; as, a milky fluid; a milky color.
Some plants, upon breaking their vessels, yield a milky Arbutus, Alliopsis, juice.
The pails high foaming with a milky flood.
Pope, Iliad, xvi. 760.

And milky every milky sail
On winding stream or distant sea.
Traveller, In Memoriam, cv.

2. Yielding milk.
Perhaps my passion he disdaineth,
And courts the milky mothers of the plains.
Romeo and Juliet, v. 1.

3. Full of milk or spawn, as oysters; a trade use.—4. Soft; mild; timorous; effeminate.

Has friendship such a faint and milky heart,
It turns in less than two nights?
Shak., T. of A., iii. 1. 57.

Thy milky meek face makes me sick with hate!
Shelley, The Consul, II. 1.

Milky quartz. Same as milk-quartz.

milky-tailed shrike, the slender silverfin, Chola galacturus, a cyprinoid fish abounding in mountain streams of the Ohio valley and southward.

Milky Way (mil'ki wā). [Formerly also milken-way; cf. D. milchweg = G. milchweg = Sw. (rare) miljkrag = Dan. milkevei.] 'The Galaxy. See Galaxy, 1.

That Milky Way which down Heaven's Mountain flows
Its beautiful smoothness to hot footstep crows.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, III. 34.

3. Full of milk or spawn, as oysters; a trade use.—4. Soft; mild; timorous; effeminate.

mill (mil), n. [ME. mill, < molle, molle, mylle, earlier maln, malne, myln, malne, < AS. mylen, myln = OFries. mole = D. molen, meulen = MLG. mole, molle, LG. mölen = OHG. mulin, mul, MHG. müle, mul, G. mühle = Icel. mylna = Sw. möla = Dan. mølle = F. moulin = Sp. molino = Pg. moinho = It. molino, < L. molina, a mill, orig. fem. of L. molinus, of a mill, < mola, a millstone, pl. molar, a mill (also grains of spelt ground) (= Gr. μύλος, a millstone, mill), < moler, grind, = Goth. malan = Icel. mala = OHG. malan = AS. malan, grind; see maln, maln, moln, moln, etc. From the L. mola are also E. mole, mole, mole, mole, etc., mole, etc., mole, etc.] 1. A mechanical device for grinding grain for food. Ancient mills, and those still in use in uncivilized or half-civilized countries, are simple devices for rubbing or pounding the grain, commonly two stones, one of which is moved upon the other by hand. The common modern mill consists essentially of two flat circular stones one of which is moved upon the other, and between which the grain is triturated. The bedstone and runner are together called a run of stone. In some mills the under stone is the runner. Such a mill is called an under runner, while an upper runner is one like that shown in the cut. The bush, g, in the bedstone is fastened in its place by wedges. The balance tynd is a curved bar which crosses the eye or central opening of the runner on the under side at the margin of the eye and supports the stone. The supporting bearing of the balance tynd has a central socket called a cock, and the supporting point of the spindle which fits the cock is called the rockhead. The spindle, balance tynd, and runner stone are raised or lowered by means of the bridge tree and lighter screw to adjust the runner properly in relation to the bedstone. The hopper, p, receives the grain to be ground, and delivers it to the shoe, which is loosely supported, and kept constantly vibrating by the rotation of the damsel, a sort of trundle wheel, the trundles of which chatter against the shoe. Flour is also made by cylinder-mills or roller mills. The rollers act by crushing, by crushing and rubbing, as when they are caused to run with different peripheral velocities, or by a cutting or scraping action, as when they are rotated and revolved in such manner that the cutting edges of one roller act toward the cutting edges of the other.

2. A machine for grinding or pulverizing any solid substance. The word in this use is generally in composition with a word denoting the purpose for which the mill is designed; as port mill, quartz mill, coffee mill.

One could see by the way he ground the coffee in the mill mailed to the wall that he was reckless of the results.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 294.

3. A machine which transforms raw material by a process other than grinding into forms fit for uses to which the raw material is unfitted. In this use also the word is generally in composition, as

They contrasted both the foe & friend,
Thy milky bath grounds the luste grite.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (C. E. T. S.), p. 74.

Much water goeth by the mill that the miller knoweth not of.
J. Heywood, Proverbs (1546), II. 5.

Two women shall be grinding at the mill. Mat. xxiv. 41.

3. A machine which transforms raw material by a process other than grinding into forms fit for uses to which the raw material is unfitted. In this use also the word is generally in composition, as saw-mill, planing-mill, etc. This use of the word is, however, limited and arbitrary, many machines which transform raw materials not being called mills.

4. A machine which does its work by rotary motion, especially a lapidary wheel.—5. A treadmill. [Colloq.]

A few weeks after I was grabbed for this, and got a mouth at the mill; but I was quite innocent of priggling. Quoted in Mayhew's London Labour and London Poor, I. 300.

6. (a) A building in which grinding is done: often in composition: as, a flour-mill, water-mill, windmill, etc. (b) In metal., any establishment in which metalliferous ores are treated in the moist way, as by stamping and amalgamating, by grinding in pans, or by similar methods. Those works in which the reduction is performed by the aid of fire are usually designated smelting works, or some times especially in the case of iron furnaces. In the manufacture of iron a mill is an establishment where the metal in the rougher form (that is, in that of blooms, slabs, rough bars, etc.) is worked up into various kinds of merchantable iron, or into those forms which are desired by the different classes of consumers of the metal, such as rails, plates, merchant bars, and many other similar products. (c) A large building used as a factory, and occupied by machinery for the purposes of manufacture: as, a silk-mill; a cotton-mill.—7. In calico-printing or bank-note engraving, a soft steel roller which receives under great pressure an impressed design in relief from a hardened steel engraved roll or die, and which is used in turn, after being hardened, to impart the design in intaglio to a calico-printing roll or note-printing plate.—8. [Cf. mill, v. 1.] A snuff-box. Also mill. [Scotch.]

As soon as I can find my mill,

Ye'll get a snuff w' right guld will.

Picken, Poems, I. 117. (Jamieson.)

He plucked forth a huge horn snuff box, or mill, as he called it, and proffered me Scott, Rob Roy, vi.

9. A kind of screw-press introduced during the reign of Elizabeth into England from France, and designed to supersede the manufacture of gold coins by the primitive method of striking dies with a hammer. It was introduced in 1601, discontinued in 1672, reintroduced in 1686 and 1688, and permanently adopted shortly after the restoration of Charles II. The more modern coining-press has supplanted this machine. The mill not only struck the legend, but also raised the rim on the margin and serrated the edge. These serrations were at first straight, but, having been found easy to imitate by filing, they were made curvilinear in the reign of George II.

Coining gold and silver with the mill and press.

Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, II. III.

10. In mining, a passage or opening left for sending down stuff from the stonies to the level beneath.—11. [Cf. mill, v. 10.] A pugilistic contest; a fight with the fists. [Slang.]

One of the most gratifying mills in the annals of the school. Dickens, Our School.

Barker's mill, an ingenious machine, moved by the centrifugal force of water, invented by Dr. Barker. It consists of a vertical axis CD, moving on a pivot at D, and carrying the upper millstone m, after passing through an opening in the fixed millstone n. Upon this vertical axis is fixed a vertical tube TT', communicating with a horizontal tube AB, at the extremities of which, A and B, are two apertures in opposite directions. When water from the mill-course MN is introduced into the tube TT', it flows out of the apertures A and B, and by the pressure of the water on the parts of the tube opposite the apertures the arm AB, and consequently the whole machine, is put in motion. The bridge truss ab is elevated or depressed by turning the nut e at the end of the lever ch. The grain to be ground is poured into the hopper H. As modified by Whitelaw it is used in Great Britain under the name of Scotch turbine. See turbine.—Canon-ball mill. See Canon-ball.—Chilian mill, a form of mill consisting of two heavy wheels or rollers, set parallel on a horizontal shaft, and having a double rotation, that on the horizontal shaft, and a second around a vertical axis controlling the horizontal shaft. The rollers travel in a vat or other suitable receptacle, and scrapers are usually provided to keep the material in the path of the wheels. This form of mill, which is of much antiquity, is now used especially for grinding oleaginous seeds, nuts, fruit, etc. See grinder.—Cone-and-cradle mill, a mill having a cone-shaped roller or grinder reciprocating in a semi-cylindrical concave or bed. E. H. Knight. Crooke's mill, also a conical name for Crooke's radiometer (which see, under radiometer).—Edge-runner mill, a mill in which the mill-stones grind by their peripheral surfaces instead of by their flat surfaces. The stones are generally two in number (though a single one is sometimes used), and run in a circular trough provided with a bottom of stone or of iron. The trough holds the material to be ground. The stones are pivoted to the ends of an axle like cart wheels, and the axle is attached in the middle to a vertical shaft which rolls the stones around in the trough, thus effecting both a rolling and a rubbing action upon the material to be ground. Such mills are used for grinding flaxseed preparatory to expressing the oil, in iron-foundries for grinding sand and clay, and for other purposes.—Horizontal mill, a mill having the acting surfaces in a horizontal plane at right angles to the vertical axis of the revolving stones, as in a grain-grinding mill.—Hydraulic, lapidary, etc., mill. See the adjectives.—Levitating mill. See levitate.—Mouse mill, a combined electromagnetic engine and induction electrical machine used for feeding forward the paper record-ribbon, and for electrifying the ink, in Thomson's siphon-recorder or for submarine telegraphy.—Revolving mill, a form of Chilian mill in which the pan turns while the axis of the rollers does not change its position; a revolving-pan mill.—To bring grist to the mill. See grist.—To go through the mill. See go.

Barker's Mill

mill (mil), v. [Cf. mill, n.] I. trans. 1. To grind in a mill; grind; reduce to fine particles or to small pieces by grinding or other means. See mill.

'Tis here; this oval box well fill'd

With best tobacco, finely mill'd.

Cooper, To the Rev. William Bull.

Raw crops and milled breadstuffs still sought the cheapest rates of freight

W. Cable, Creoles of Louisiana, p. 240.

2. To subject to the mechanical operations carried on in a mill, as a saw-mill or planing-mill; shape or finish by machinery. Specifically, in ceram., to prepare (the clay) by passing it through a mill, which is usually of the form of an inverted cone, in the center of which is a vertical shaft set with knives. The clay, being thrown in at the top, is kneaded, cut, and pressed by the revolution of the shaft, and when it emerges from the bottom is plastic and ready for molding. See pay-mill.

Lumbermen charge the consumer for the full measurement of the boards (for floors) before they are milled.

Art Age, IV. 46.

3. To cut (metal) with a milling-tool in a milling-machine.—4. To turn or upset the edge of (a coin) so as to produce a marginal ridge or flange on both sides, upon which, when laid flat, the coin rests, thus protecting the design which is inside of the flange from wear, and enabling the coins to lie firmly when piled together one upon another.—5. To flute the edge of, as of a coin, or of any flat piece of metal, as the head of a milled screw or the rim of a metal box-cover, to afford a hold for the fingers. The screws of optical and surgical instruments, and other philosophical apparatus, and also the covers of lubricators for machinery, are commonly milled.

Wood's halfpence are not milled, and therefore more easily counterfeited. Scott, Draper's Letters, III.

6. To tumble (leather) in a hollow revolving cylinder in contact with oil or any ameliorating or tanning liquid, whereby the liquid is worked into all parts of the leather.

Twenty-five sides [of leather] being placed in the wheel at one time and . . . gambler liquor poured over them, . . . in this wheel they are milled for about ten minutes. Davies, Leather, p. 497.

7. To throw, as undyed silk. Encyc. Diet.—8. To thicken by fulling; full (cloth), as in a fulling-mill.—9. To yield, in the process of grinding or milling.—10. To beat severely with the fists; fight. [Slang.]

Having conquer'd the prime one that mill'd us all round, You kick'd him, old Ben, as he gasp'd on the ground. Moore, Political and Satirical Poems, Tom Crib to Big Ben

11. To cause to froth: as, to mill chocolate.—Milled screw. See screw.

II. intrans. 1. To move in a circular direction around a central point or object in a purposeless manner; said of cattle in herding on the plains. [U. S.]

The cattle may begin to run, and then get milling—that is, all crowd together into a mass like a ball, wherein they move round and round, trying to keep their heads towards the center, and refusing to leave it. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 502.

2. To turn suddenly and change its course: said of a whale; as, the whale milled, and ran to leeward. C. M. Seammon, Marine Mammals, p. 311.

mill (mil), n. [Cf. L. mille, pl. milia, milia, a thousand. From the L. mille are also ult. E. mile, million, the first element of millennium, milfoil, etc., and the latter part of billion, trillion, etc.] One thousandth part of anything; especially in the monetary system of the United States, one thousandth of a dollar, or one tenth of a cent.

mill (mil), n. [Cf. *ME. mil, mylde (cf. AS. mil), < OE. mil, meil = Fr. mil, meil = Sp. millo, mijo = Port. milho = It. miglio, < L. milium, millet. Cf. millet, in form a dim. of mill.] Millet.

They make excellent drink of Rise, of Mil, and of honic, being well and high coloured like wine.

Hall's Voyages, I. 93.

mill (mil), v. t. and i. [Perhaps a particular use of mill, v.] To steal. [Old slang.]

Can they cant or mill? are they masters in their art?

B. Jonson, Disputes Metamorphosed.

Miller's asthma. Same as laryngismus stridulus (which see, under laryngismus).

mill-bar (mil'bar), n. Rough bar-iron as drawn out by the puddlers' rolls, as distinguished from merchant bar, which is finished bar-iron ready for sale.

millboard (mil'bôrd), n. A stout kind of pasteboard especially used by binders for the stiff boards upon which the leather or other material for bindings is pasted or glued.—mill-board cutter, a machine having a shaft bearing adjustable knives, used for cutting millboard and cardstock to the sizes required for bookbinding or bookmaking.

mill-cake (mil'kak), n. 1. In gunpowder-manuf., the cake or mass resulting from the incorporation of the materials. This cake is subjected to a process of granulation.—2. The by-product from linseed, consisting of what is left after the oil has been pressed out.

mill-cinder (mil'sin'der), n. In iron-working, the slag of the puddling- or reheating-furnace. After being properly roasted, it consists essentially of the magnetic oxide of iron, and is used as setting in puddling-furnaces, under the name of bludop.

mill-dam (mil'dam), n. 1. A dam designed to check the flow of a stream and cause the water to rise until a sufficient head has been obtained to furnish the power necessary for turning a mill-wheel.

The which, once being brunt,

Like to great Mill-dam forth fiercely gush't.

Spenser, F. Q., v. xi. 21.

2. A mill-pond. [Scotch and U. S.]

mildew, n. An absolute spelling of mildew.—mill-driver (mil'dri'vër), n. The combination of devices by which is effected the immediate transmission of power from the motor to the runner-millstone of a mill.

milled (mild), p. a. [Pp. of mill, v.] 1. Made or prepared in or by a grinding-mill.—2. Having undergone the operations of a mill or coining-press: as, milled money. See milled money, below.

Four milled crown pieces (or twenty milled shillings of the present coin). Locke, Lowering of Interest.

3. Serrated or transversely grooved.

A small condensing lens, and provided with a milled head whereby it can be rotated. Science, XII. 60.

4. Having been formed or treated by machinery; specifically, in printing, made smooth by calendering rollers in a paper-mill.—Double-milled cloth, cloth which has been twice milled to give increased thickness.—Milled cloth, cloth which has been thickened by beating until it is full or felt.—Milled lead. See lead.—Milled money, coins struck in a mill or coining press, as distinguished from those produced from a die by striking it with a hammer. See hammered money (under hammer) and compare coining-press. (Milled money was invented by Antoine Brucher in France, and the first was struck in that country about 1653. Elizabeth of England coined milled money from about 1662 to 1672, when the use of the mill was discontinued, on account of its expense, till about 1680. After 1682 it remained completely established, on account of many advantages which more than compensated for the cost. . . . It seems that they milled sixpences (were sometimes kept as counters. Sares.) million (mil'ion), n. See glass.

millenarian (mil-e-ná'ri-an), a. and n. [Sometimes improp. millennarian; < millenary + -an.]

I. a. Relating or pertaining to a thousand, specifically to an expected millennial period of righteousness on earth; chiliastic: as, millenarian speculations.

II. n. One who believes in the millennium; more specifically, one who believes that Christ will visibly reign on earth with his saints for a thousand years or for an indefinite period of time before the end of the world; a chiliast. See millennium.

millenarianism (mil-e-ná'ri-an-izm), n. [Sometimes improp. millennarianism; < millenarian + -ism.] The doctrine of or belief in the coming of the millennium; the doctrine of the reappearance of Christ on earth, the establishment of his kingdom, the resurrection of the saints and of the remaining dead for the general judgment, and an intervening period of a thousand years (or of indefinite length) of perfect righteousness. In the early church the doctrine of millenarianism (chiliasm) was generally held, and many, both of the otherwise orthodox and of heretics, were accused of holding it in a literal or even a gross and sensual sense. Thus, after the fourth century it fell into general disfavor. As A. D. 1000 approached there was a widespread panic throughout Europe, under the idea that the prophetic thousand years had expired and that Satan would be let loose. Millenarianism showed itself again in the views of Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy Men, Millerites, etc. See chiliasm, millennium, premillenarianism, postmillenarianism.

At various periods in the history of the Middle Ages we encounter sudden outbreaks of millenarianism.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 217.

millennarism (mil'-e-ni-izm), n. [F. millénarisme; as millénar(y) + -ism.] Millenary doctrine or belief; millenarianism.

millenary (mil'-e-ni-ri), a. and n. [= F. millénaire = Sp. milenario = Pg. It. millenario, < L. millenarius, containing a thousand, < milli-, a thousand each, < L. mille, a thousand; see mille.] 1. a. Consisting of or pertaining to a thousand, specifically a thousand years; in a restricted sense, of or pertaining to the millennium.

We are apt to dream that God will make his saints reign here as kings in a millenary kingdom.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 227.

For I foretold that millenary year.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., Ded., I. 81.

millenary petition, a petition presented by about a thousand Puritan ministers to James I. on his progress to London in April, 1603, asking for certain changes in ceremonial, etc.

II. n.; pl. millenarias (-riz). 1. An aggregate of a thousand; specifically, a period of a thousand years; in a restricted sense, the millennium.

Where to fix the beginning of that marvelous millenary, and where to end.

Sp. Hall, Breathings of the Devout Soul, § 15.

2. a. A commander or leader of a thousand men.

Likewise the dukes assign places unto every millenary, or conductor of a thousand souldiers.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 60.

3. a. One who expects the millennium. See millenarian.

The doctrine of the millenaries . . . in the best ages was esteemed no heresy.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 318.

millennial (mil-len-i-ál), a. [F. millénaire + -al.] Consisting of or relating to a thousand years; pertaining to a millennium, or specifically to the millennium; as, a millennial period; millennial expectations.

To be kings and priests unto God is the characteristic of those that are to enjoy the millennial happiness.

Hp. Burnett.

millennialist (mil-len-i-ál-ist), n. [F. millénariste; as millénariste + -ist.] One who believes in a millennial reign of Christ on earth; a chiliast.

millennianism (mil-len-i-án-izm), n. [millennian* (< millennium + -an) + -ism.] Millenarianism.

At the outset of Christianity a cross millennianism clouded the vision of very many. Prog. Orthodoxy, p. 166.

millenniarism (mil-len-i-á-rizm), n. [millenniar* (< millennium + -ar) + -ism.] Millenarianism.

millennist (mil'-en-ist), n. [= F. milléniste; as milléniste + -ist.] A millenarian.

millennium (mil-len-i-um), n. [= F. millénium = Sp. milenio = Pg. milênio, < NL. millennium, < L. mille, a thousand, + annus, year; see annual.]

1. An aggregate of a thousand years; a period or interval of one thousand years; as, the millennium of the occupation of Iceland celebrated in 1874.

To us nothing seems more unlikely, more inconceivable, than two millenniums of high Egyptian civilization. . . . while all the rest of the world was sunk in darkness.

G. Haskins, Origin of Nations, I. 151.

Specifically—2. In theol., a period during which the kingdom of Christ will be established upon the earth and will predominate over all other authority. The phrase "a thousand years," in Rev. ix. 1-5, has been understood literally, or (on the principle that in Scripture prophecies a day stands for a year, and the Jewish year contained 360 days) as representing 360,000 years. It is generally regarded as indicating an indefinite but long period, and belief in such a period is universal in the Christian church. But whether this predominance of the kingdom of Christ will be accomplished gradually by the gospel, and will precede Christ's second coming, or will follow his second coming and be accomplished by it, is disputed. This question divides theologians into two schools, the postmillenarians, who hold the former view, and the premillenarians, who hold the latter; while many hold that the millennium represents the gospel dispensation or reign of the church, and has accordingly already prevailed for many centuries.

millepede, milleped (mil'-e-ped, mil'-i-ped), n. [= F. millepède = Sp. milipes = Pg. milipeças = It. millepiedi, < L. millepēda, < mille, thousand, + pes (< ped) = E. foot.] 1. A thousand-legs; a myriapod of the suborder Chilognatha or Diplopoda; so called from the very numerous feet, though these are not nearly a thousand in number. The feet are about twice as numerous as those of the similar creatures called centipeds, there being two pairs instead of one pair to most of the segments; the legs are also shorter, and the body is harder and more cylindrical. Millepeds are found in water, and in wet or damp places beneath logs, stones, etc. Unlike some of the centipeds, all are quite harmless animals. Some of the commonest belong to the family Julidae, as Julus subulorum. The tufted millepeds are Polyschoda; the false millepeds, Polyschodidae. Mill-millepeds belong to the family Glomeridae; they are comparatively short and stout, and can roll themselves up into a ball, like the wood lice of the genus Armadillo. See Chilognatha, and cata under Myriapoda and thousand-legs.

2. Some small crustacean with many legs, as an isopodous slater; a wood-louse.

Millepora (mi-lep'-o-rá), n. [NL.: see millepora.] The typical genus of the family Milleporidae, so called from the numerous pores upon the surface. These are the openings of as many tubular cells or cavities which traverse the hard coralline substance, and are themselves divided in their deeper parts by close-set transverse partitions or tubular diaphragms, vertical septa being rudimentary or absent.

Millepora alcyonella.

millepore (mil'-e-pór), n. [= F. millepore = Sp. milépore = It. millepora, < NL. Millepora, < L. mille, a thousand, + porus, a passage; see pore.] A coralline hydrozoan of the family Milleporidae. The millepores were long supposed to be corals, and such is their appearance and the part they play in the formation of reefs. They belong, however, to a different class of animals, the Hydrozoa (not Actinozoa), being among the few members of their class which form a hard calcareous polypary or polypodium like the stone-corals, and the leading representatives of the order called Hydrocorallina (which see). The innumerable substance forms a dense deposit upon the outer surface of the ramified hydrozoome. There are two kinds of zooids or polypites: short broad alimentary zooids (gastrozooids) with 4 or 6 tentacles, surrounded each by a zone of from 5 to 20 or more long mouthless zooids (autozooids) with numerous tentacles, having no ampullae. The zooids are dilated at their bases, and there give off tubular processes which ramify and imbricate, giving rise to a thin hydrozoome.

Milleporidae (mil'-e-pór-i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Millepora + -ada.] A family of hydrocoralline hydrozoans, typified by the genus Millepora. See millepora and Hydrocorallina.

milleporiform (mil'-e-pór-i-fór-m), a. [< NL. Millepora + L. forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of a millepore; milleporine.

Milleporina (mi-lep'-o-rí-ná), n. pl. [NL., < Millepora + -ina.] Same as Milleporidae.

milleporine (mil'-e-pó-rín), a. Pertaining to the Milleporidae, or having their characters; resembling a millepore; milleporiform.

milleporite (mil'-e-pór-ít), n. [< millepora + -ite.] A fossil millepore.

miller (mil'-er), n. [ME. miller, meller, millere, millere, earlier myllner, myllner, myllner (a form remaining in the surname Milner), < *AS. myllere (not recorded; another term was myllweard, 'mill-ward') = OE. milcari = Fris. meller = D. mulder, mulenaar = MLG. mulner, mulre, mulder = OHG. mulnari, MHG. mulnere, mulner, G. müller (as a surname also Milner) = Lecl. myllari = Sw. myllnare = Dan. møller, < L. molinarus, a miller, < molina, a mill; see mill, n.] 1. One who grinds grain in a mill; one who keeps or who attends to a mill, especially a grain-mill.

More water glideth by the mill

Than wote the miller of.

Shak., Tit. And., II. 1. 87.

2. A milling-machine. — 3. A moth whose wings appear as if dusted over with flour or meal, like a miller's clothes; hence, almost any small moth, such as fly about lights at night. Common millers in the United States are Spilosoma virginica, a moth whose larva is one of the woolly-bear caterpillars, and Diphanera cuneata, the web worm moth. The little yellowish moths of the genera Crambus and Bupalus are also commonly called millers. See cata under Crambidae and Hypantrina.

4. A fish, the eagle-ray, Myliobatis aquila; a mill-skate. — 5. The hen-harrier, Circus cyaneus. [Prov. Eng.] — 6. A young flycatcher. [C. Macdonald, Brit. Birds, 1885, p. 49. [Local, Eng.] — Cross miller. See cross, n.

millering (mil'-er-ing), n. [< miller + -ing.] The dust of a flour-mill.

And she would meal you with millering

That she gathers at the mill.

East Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 278).

Millerism (mil'-er-izm), n. [< Miller (see Millerite) + -ism.] The doctrines of the Millerites.

Millerite (mil'-er-ít), n. [< Miller (see def.) + -ite.] A disciple of the American William Miller, who from 1833 till his death in 1840 publicly interpreted the Scriptures as fixing the second advent of Christ and the beginning of the millennium in the immediate future (at first about 1843). His followers form a still existing denomination of Adventists.

millerrite (mil'-er-ít), n. [Named after W. H. Miller (died 1880), an English crystallographer.] Native nickel sulphide, a mineral having a bronze color and metallic luster, often occurring in tests of capillary crystals, and hence called harp-pyrites, capillary pyrites. It is found also in incrustations with fibrous or radiated structure; in the latter form it is a valuable nickel ore.

millier's coat (mil'-erz-kót), n. A coat of fence in use in the sixteenth century, apparently a buff-coat or similar defense of leather.

millier's dog (mil'-erz-dog), n. A kind of shark or dogfish, Galus canis.

millier's thumb (mil'-erz-thum), n. 1. A fish, Cottus gobio, of the family Cottidae. The name is due to the fancied resemblance of the head to the form a Miller's thumb (Cottus gobio).

millier's thumb is popularly supposed to assume from the frequent sampling of meal with the hand.

2. Any fresh-water sculpin of the genus Uranula; one of the little star gazers, of which there are several species, as U. richardsoni, [U. S.] — 3. The bib (a fish), Gadus lucanus. [Great Britain.] — 4. The golden-crowned wren, Regulus cristatus; the thumb-bird. [Eng.] — 5. The willow-warbler, Phylloscopus trochilus.

millesimal (mi-lés-i-mál), a. [= F. milésimo = Sp. milésimo = Pg. It. millesimo, < L. millesimus, the thousandth, < mille, a thousand; see mille.] Thousandth; consisting of thousandth parts; as, millesimal fractions.

millet (mil'-et), n. [< F. millet, millet, dim. of mil, millet; see mille.] 1. A cereal grass, Panicum miliaceum, known from antiquity, and still cultivated in the East and in southern and central Europe. It is an annual, from 2 to 4 feet high, with profuse foliage, the flowers abundant, in open nodding panicles. The grain is one of the best for fowls, and affords a nutritious and palatable table-food. As cultivated in the United States, it is mostly used for fowls, and elsewhere it is less sowed than formerly.

2. One of several other grasses; generally with a prefixed descriptive. See below. — Arabian or evergreen millet, a variety of Indian millet. [Local, U. S.] — Cat-tail, East Indian, Egyptian, pearl millet, in the southern United States, a tall grass, Pennisetum spicatum, there cultivated as a forage-plant. In India it serves as a cereal. — German, Hungarian millet. See Indian millet. — Indian millet, African millet, a stout cereal grass commonly known as Sorghum vulgare, but now regarded as part of a multiform species, Andropogon Sorghum, which includes among its varieties the common broom-corn and sorghum. It is extensively cultivated in the Mediterranean region and the Orient, occupying the place of a staple grain. The seed properly treated makes a bread of good quality, and is a good grain for quadrupeds and fowls. The plant serves also for green fodder. This is the durum or doura of Africa and India. It has been introduced to some extent into the United States, where it is sometimes called coffee or chocolate-corn, because of its attempted use as a substitute for coffee. Also called guinea-corn, kufti-corn. — Italian millet, Setaria Italica, originally an Asiatic grass. Its variety Germanica is known as German or Hungarian millet and bequa or Hungarian grass. (See grass.) Its seeds are sown in cage birds and fowls, and it is to some extent used as a food grain; in America it is raised mostly for fowls. Millet coda or rhoda, the grain of Paspalum acrochordatum, an East Indian cereal.

millet-grass (mil'-et-grás), n. See Milium.

mill-eye (mil'-í), n. The eye or opening in the cases of a mill at which the meal is let out.

A noble and acutely baron's mill, . . . that casts the meal through the mill-eye by torpits at a time.

Scott, Pirate, xi.

mill-feeder (mil'-fe-dér), n. A projection on a mill-spindle which agitates a spout beneath the hopper, thus shaking the grain into the eye of the runner.

mill-file (mil'-fil), n. A thin flat file used in machine-work for lathe-work and draw-filing. E. H. Knight.

mill-furnace (mil'-fer-nás), n. In iron-works, a furnace in which the puddled bar, or the higher grades of malleable iron, are reheated in order to be re-rolled or welded under the hammer or mill-rolls.

A miller (Cambridge academic). (Just shows natural size.)

mill-gang (mil'gang), n. In warping, that part of the warp which is made by a descending and ascending course of the threads round the warping-mill. E. H. Knight.

mill-hand (mil'hænd), n. A person employed in a mill.

mill-head (mil'hed), n. The head of water by which a mill-wheel is turned.

mill-holm (mil'hóm), n. A low meadow or field in the vicinity of a mill, or a marshy place about a mill-dam.

mill-hopper (mil'höp'ér), n. In a grinding-mill, a hopper from which grain is supplied to the stones. Mill-hopper alarm, an automatic device for giving notice to the miller, usually by a bell, when the grain in the hopper is nearly exhausted.

mill-horse (mil'hôrs), n. A horse (often blind) used to turn a mill.

It's a dull thing to travel, like a mill horse.
Still in the place he was born in, land and blinded.
Pletcher (and another), Queen of Cornish, ll. 4.

milli- [L. mille, millia, milia, a thousand; see million.] An element meaning 'thousand,' also used for 'a thousandth part,' especially in words relating to physics; as, millimeter (the thousandth part of a meter).

milliampere (mil'i-amp'ér), n. [L. mille, a thousand (see mili-), + E. ampere.] An electrical unit equal to the thousandth part of an ampere.

milliard (mil'yård), n. [F. milliard, < L. mille (< L. mille, thousand) + -ard.] A thousand millions; as, a milliard of francs. This word became familiar in English through the payment by France to Germany, after the close of the war of 1870-1, of an indemnity of five milliards of francs (about $1,000,000,000).

milliare (mil'i-är), n. [L. < mille, a thousand; see mili-.] An ancient unit of length, 8 stadia; a mile.

milliare (mil'i-är), n. [F. milliare, < L. mille, a thousand (see mili-), + F. are, an acre; see are.] A unit of surface in the metric system, the one thousandth part of an are, equivalent to 154.07 square inches.

milliary (mil'i-är-i), a. and n. [= F. milliaire, < L. miliaris, miliaris, containing a thousand, neut. miliarium, miliarium, the number one thousand, a milestone, < mille, pl. milia, a thousand; see mili-.] I. a. Pertaining to the ancient Roman mile of a thousand paces or five thousand Roman feet; marking a mile.

Before this was once placed a milliary column, supposed to be set in the center of the city.
Evlyn, Diary, Nov. 4, 1644.

II. n. A milestone; specifically, a stone or column set up to form a point of departure in measuring distances.

When we approached Sidon, I saw, about a mile from the town, a distant Roman milliary in the road. . . . It is a round pillar of grey granite.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. 86.

millier (mil'yä'), n. [F. < L. mille, a thousand; see mili-.] In the metric system, a weight equal to a thousand kilograms, or 2,204.6 pounds avoirdupois (nearly a ton). It is the weight of one cubic meter of water at 4° C.

millifold (mil'i fôld), a. [L. mille, a thousand, + F. -fold.] Thousandfold.

His knees millifold
Bewray his love and bounding diligence.
Darwin, Holy Roodie, p. 77. (Darwin)

milligram, milligramme (mil'i-gram), n. [= L. milligramma, < F. milligramme, < mille, a thousand (see mili-), + gramme, a gram; see gram.] The thousandth part of a gram, equal to 0.015432, or about $\frac{1}{65}$, of a grain.

milliliter, millilitre (mil'i-lit'ér), n. [= It. millilitro, < F. millilitre, < mille, a thousand (see mili-), + litre, a liter; see liter.] A French measure of capacity containing the thousandth part of a liter, equal to 0.00102 of a cubic inch.

millimeter, millimetre (mil'i-met'ér), n. [= It. millimetro, < F. millimètre, < mille, a thousand (see mili-), + F. mètre, meter; see meter.] The thousandth part of a meter, equal to 0.03937 inch, or nearly $\frac{1}{25}$ inch. It is denoted by mm.; as, 25.4 mm. is 1 inch.

milliner (mil'i-nér), n. [Formerly also milliner, millener, millener; prob. orig. Milaner, a trader from or with Milan (formerly spelled Milaine, Milique, etc.) in Italy, famous for its silks and ribbons, as well as for its cutlery; < Milan + -er.] (cf. Milanese. The term milliner was formerly used in this connection, has no relevancy, not being connected with Milaine in Italy. The word milliner was formerly explained as designating "one having a thousand small wares to sell" (Minshew), as if < L. mille- narius, containing a thousand, < mille, a thousand; see millenary.) 1. Formerly, a man who dealt in articles for women's wear; according to Johnson, "one who sells ribbands and dresses for women"; now, in common usage, a woman who makes and sells bonnets and other head-gear for women; also, in England, one who furnishes both bonnets and dresses, or complete outfits.

No Milliner can so fit his customers with Gloves.
Shak., W. T. (folio 1633), IV. 4. 102.

To conceal such real ornaments as these, and shadow their glory, as a milliner's wife does her wrought stomacher with a smoky lawn or a black cypress!
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour (ed. Whalley, 1750), II. 3.

2. Formerly, one who made or sold armor of Milan; hence, a dealer in armor.

After the year 1500 there were great shops, where armour was sold by the milliners or armours of Milan, and by others; and whole suits of armour are frequently found exactly like each other, as they were made for sale to the first comer, and not for any person in particular.
R. Curzon, Archæol. Inst. Jour., XXII. 6.

Milliner's fold, a strip of velvet, silk, or the like, folded near both edges, and then again so as to bring one of the two original folds above the other. — Milliner's needle, a long slender needle used in trimming bonnets, etc.

millinery (mil'i-nér-i), n. [cf. milliner + -y.] 1. The articles made or sold by a milliner. — 2. The industry of making bonnets and other head-dresses for women. This work was formerly in the hands of men, but is now almost exclusively a women's occupation.

Those who are cunning in the arts of millinery and dressmaking.
Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xvii.

millinet (mil'i-nét), n. [Fr. < millin(er) + -et.] 1. A sort of coarse, stiff, thin muslin. — 2. A machine-made net. I. H. Knight.

milling (mil'ing), n. [Verbal n. of mill, v.]

1. The process of grinding, or subjecting materials to the action of the machinery of a grinding-mill. Specifically — 2. The manufacture of cereals into flour or meal. The manufacture of the flour is now carried on by two distinct methods, respectively called low milling and high milling. Low milling prevailed almost universally until a recent period, but it is now largely superseded by high milling, by which an increased product and a much purer quality of flour are obtainable, especially from wheats inferior to the higher grades. In low milling the grain is ground only once and then bolted. In high milling it is subjected to repeated grindings. The earlier grinding or grindings decorticate the grain, which, being subjected after each grinding to screening and blowing in the milldusts further, is freed from adherent impurities, and from parts which envelop the finer nutritious portions. The latter thus obtained are called semolina (half ground). The semolina is then subjected to grinding, cylinder-milling, or disintegration-milling, to complete its conversion into fine flour. Cylinder-milling, also called roller-milling, is the manufacture of flour by the use of cylinder-mills. Disintegration-milling is the manufacture of flour or meal by the use of the disintegrator. (See mill.)

3. The operation of upsetting the edge of a coin blank to form the milled edge; also, the operation of putting the series of small transverse ridges and furrows on the edge of an otherwise finished coin, or on a screw-head to adapt it for easy turning with the fingers. See milled screw, under screw. — 4. A method of shaping metals in a milling-machine, by passing the metal under a serrated revolving cylinder or cutter. — 5. In milled-marking, a method of ornamenting metallic surfaces by treatment in a lathe with ribbed tools, which produce ridged surfaces. — 6. A method of softening and opening the pores of hides by placing them with some tan liquor in a wooden drum which is caused to revolve. — 7. The felting or fulling of a cloth to thicken it.

The term milling embraces all those operations which are calculated to effect the felted of the woolen fibres in the fabric by means of pressure or friction.
Benedict, Coal tar Colours (trans.), p. 84.

8. In pottery, the operation of grinding and mixing the slip. — 9. A thrashing; a fight; a boating. [Slang.]

One blood gives t'other blood a milling.
M. Combe, Dr. Syntax, II. 2.

I tried like to be it out with destiny, and put myself in a cribb like attitude for a milling match with my fortunes.
Mrs. Gore, Cecil, p. 158.

10. The act of playing around in a circle; said of a school of fish. Also called cart-wheeling. High milling, in flour-manuf., a method of milling in which the wheat is subjected to a succession of slight partial crushing operations, the product being sifted and sorted after each operation. Low milling, the older process of close grinding with the stones as near together as possible, as opposed to the more modern high milling.

milling-cutter (mil'ing-kut'ér), n. Same as milling-machine.

milling-machine (mil'ing-má-shén'), n. 1. A power machine-tool for shaping metal and cutting the teeth of gears by means of a rotating serrated spindle or cylindrical cutter. It has a movable table, to which the work is fixed and on which it is brought to the cutter; and it is fitted with index-gages and other appliances for securing accuracy in the work.

The position occupied by the milling-machine in modern practical mechanics is almost as important as that occupied by the lathe or planing-machine.

Joshua Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 282.

2. A machine for impressing on coins a milled edge or legend corresponding to the milling.

Millingtonia (mil'ing-tó-ni-ä), n. [NL. (Carl Linné, filius, 1761), named after Thomas Millington, a professor at Oxford.] A genus of bigoniateous trees, with corky bark, opposite, 2- to 3-pinnate leaves, and handsome white flowers, the corolla-tube often 2 to 3 inches long, disposed in corymbs at the ends of the branches. There is but one species, M. lagotis, the East Indian cork-tree, the exact original habitat of which is not known, but which has been cultivated in India from the earliest records. (See cork tree.)

milling-tool (mil'ing-tól), n. A small indented roller used to mill or murl the edges of the heads of screws; a murling-tool.

million (mil'yón), n. and a. [cf. ME. miloun, milion = D. milioen, miljoen = G. Sw. Dan. million, < OF. The number of ten hundred thousand, or a thousand thousand.

Conquer not his goods
For millions of money; nor better him ychone.
Piers Plowman (A), III. 255.

O, pardon! since a crooked figure may Attest in little place a million.
Shak., Hen. V., ProL, I. 16.

2. The amount of a thousand thousand units of money, as pounds, dollars, or francs; as, he is worth a million; millions have been wasted in preparation for war — 3. A very great number or quantity, indefinitely.

For we are at the stake,
And bay'd about with many enemies,
And some that smile have in their hearts, I fear,
Millions of mischief.
Shak., J. C., IV. 1. 51.

There are millions of truths that men are not concerned to know.
Locke.

The million, the great body of the people; the multitude; the public; the masses.

For the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviare to the general.
Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 467.

Three-million bill, in U. S. hist. a bill passed in 1847 appropriating three million dollars for the purchase of land from Mexico. It was introduced in the House of Representatives with the Wilmot Proviso (see proviso) as a rider and passed by the Senate after rejection of the rider.

II. n. [Strictly a collective noun; see hundred.] A thousand times one thousand; ten hundred thousand; as, a capital of a million dollars; a country of ten million inhabitants.

million (mil'yón), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of million.

millionaire, millionnaire (mil-yón-är'), n. [= D. G. millionair = Sw. millionär = Dan. millionær; < F. millionnaire (= Sp. millionario, millonario = Pg. It. millionario), one who owns a million, < million, a million; see million.] A man worth a million dollars, pounds, francs, etc.; an owner of a million or of millions.

The plain unscepter'd king the man of gold,
The thrice illustrious threefold millionaire,
Mark his slow-crawling, doul, metallic stare.
O. F. Holmes, The Banker's Manner.

millionary (mil'yón-är-i), a. [= F. millionnaire; as million + -ary.] Pertaining to or consisting of millions; as, the millionary chronology of the Pundits. [Imp. Dict.] millioned (mil'yón'd), a. [cf. million + -ed.] 1. Multiplied by millions. [Rare.]

Time, when million'd accidents
Creep in 'twixt vows and change decrees of kings.
Shak., Sonnets, cxxv.

2. Having millions.

The million'd merchant seeks her in his gold.
P. Whitehead, Honour, a Satire.

millionism (mil'yón-izm), n. [cf. million + -ism.] The state or condition of having millions. Billionism or even millionism must be a blessed kind of state.
O. F. Holmes, Elsie Venner, vii.

millionist (mil'yón-ist), n. [cf. million + -ist.] A millionaire.

A commercial millionist.
Southey, Doctor, cxxxiii.

millionize (mil'yón-iz), v. t. & i. [pret. and pp. millionized, pp. millionizing.] [cf. million + -ize.] To accustom to millions. [Rare.]

To our now millionized conceptions the foregoing accounts appear to be in a very moderate ratio.
Archæologia, XXXIII. 201.

millionaire, n. See millionaire.
millionth (mil'yonth), a. and n. [< million + -th.] L. a. Ten hundred thousandth; being one of a million.

II. n. One of a million parts; the quotient of unity divided by a million; a ten hundred thousandth part.

milled, a. See milled.

milled (mil'péd), n. Same as milled.
millistere (mil'i-stär), n. [< F. millistere, < L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. stère, a stere.] In the metric system, a unit of dry measure, the one thousandth part of a stere, equivalent to 1 cubic decimeter or 61.023 cubic inches. It is not in practical use.

millivolt (mil'i-vôlt), n. [< L. mille, a thousand, + E. volt.] The thousandth part of a volt.

mill-jade (mil'jad), n. A mill-horse.
 * Would you have me stalk like a mill-jade,
 All day, for one that will not yield us grains?
B. Jonson, Alchemist, III. 2.

millman (mil'man), n.; pl. millmen (-men). One who is employed in a mill.

The millmen are also unable to work with their usual vigour.
The Engineer, LXV. 526.

mill-money (mil'mun'i), n. Milled or coined money.

What should you,
 Or any old man, do, wearing away
 In this world with diseases, and desire
 Only to live to make their children scurge-sticks,
 And hoard up mill-money? Beau. and Fl., Captain, I. 3.

mill-mountain (mil'moun'tân), n. A European flax, Linum catharticum.

millocrat (mil'ô-krat), n. [< milli + -ocrat as in aristocrat, etc.] A wealthy mill-owner; a manufacturer who has a wide influence from his wealth or the number of people in his employment. [Rare.]

The true blood-suckers, the venomous millocrats.
Bulwer, Customs, II. 4. (Davies.)

millocratism (mil'ô-krat-izm), n. [< millocrat + -ism.] The rule of millocrats. Bulwer.

millout, n. An obsolete form of millon.

mill-pick (mil'pik), n. A tool for dressing millstones—that is, giving them a corrugated or otherwise roughened surface. Also called millstone-hammer, millstone-pick.

mill-pond (mil'pond), n. A pond or reservoir of water for use in driving a mill-wheel.

mill-pool (mil'pôl), n. [*< ME. millepôl, < AS. mylenpôl, mylenpôl, < mylen, mill, + pôl, pool.] A mill-pond.

mill-post (mil'pôst), n. A stout post bearing some essential relation to a mill, e. g., a post forming the vertical shaft of a windmill, and especially, in some forms of windmill, as the post-mill, the post upon which the entire mill is supported, or a post upon which the cap of a smock-mill, bearing the sails, turns.

They [the trees of New England] are not very thick, yet many of them are sufficient to make Mill posts; some being three foot and a half in the diameter.
S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1870), p. 30.

Out of doors reigned Molly Mills. . . with her short red petticoat, legs like millposts.

mill-race (mil'räs), n. The current of water that drives a mill-wheel, or the channel in which it flows from the dam to the mill.

mill-ream (mil'rēm), n. A package of hand-made paper containing 480 sheets, of which the two outer quires (48 sheets) are imperfect. A ream of 480 sheets of perfect paper is known as a ream of insides. [Eng.]

mill-rine, n. In her. See forsele mouline.

mill-rolls (mil'rôlz), n. pl. The rolls employed in bringing puddled bar-iron into suitable shape for the market.

millround (mil'round), n. A monotonous round of labor like that on a treadmill.

How sick he must have been of the eternal millround—seed-time and harvest.
in Broughton, Cometh up as a Flower, v.

mill-rynd (mil'rind), n. The rynd of a millstone. See rynd, and mill, 1.

mill-sail (mil'säl), n. A sail of a windmill. In windmills there are usually four of these sails, of canvas, supported on the sail-frames or "whips," and sometimes provided with ricing devices by which the surfaces exposed to the action of wind can be varied in extent to adapt them to variations in the force of the wind. See windmill and wind-wheel.

mill-scale (mil'skäl), n. An incrustation of a black oxide of iron formed on iron in the process of being rolled, just as forge-scale is on that which is being forged. In the one case it peels off in the rolling; in the other it is thrown off by the blows of the hammer.

mill-sixpence (mil'siks'pens), n. An English silver coin, of the value of sixpence, produced by the mill-and-screw process. See milled money, under milled.

Pal. Pistol, did you pick Master Slender's purse?
Sen. Ay, by these gloves, did he . . . of seven groats in mill-sixpences. Shak., M. W. of W., I. 1. 158.

mill-skate (mil'skät), n. The eagle-ray, Myliobatis aquila.

mill-spindle (mil'spin'dl), n. The vertical shaft or spindle of a grinding-mill, by which the runner or revolving millstone is supported. See mill, 1.

mill-stank (mil'stangk), n. A mill-pond or -dam.

And that the authority given by the Commissioner of Sewers did not extend to Mills, Mill stanks, (au-seys, etc., erected before the Reign of King E. 1.
Case of Chester (Mill, 10 Coke, 138, b.)

millstone (mil'stôn), n. [Early mod. E. also millstone; < ME. mylston, myllestun, myllestun, myllestun, < AS. myl-cylen (= D. molenstein = MLG. molenstên = MHG. mülstein, G. mülstein = Dan. møllesten, n. millstone, < mylen, mill, + stan, stone; see mill and stone.] One of a pair of cylindrical stones used in a mill for grinding grain. The kind of stone best adapted for this use is known as barstone, and is found in France and Models of Dressing Millstones.

 a. Radial and circular dress. b. Quarter dress. c. Three forms in a grain bag plate. d. Grooved and circular dress.

In Georgia, U. S. The two stones are placed one over the other; and in the operation of grinding one of them remains at rest and is called the bed, while the other, usually the upper stone, revolves and is called the runner. (See mill, 1.) The face of a millstone is cut with lines or channels called furrows, which lead from the center to the circumference and have flat spaces between them called land. The furrows and land are together called the dress, they are arranged in various ways. A sunken space about the eye of the stone is called the brunn.

As don these rollers or three mylen stones.
Chaucer, Troilus, II. 1344.

Boiling-millstone. See boiling. Fairy millstone. See fairy. Java millstone. See Java. Millstone-dress, the arrangement of the furrows on the face of a millstone. — To see into or through a millstone, to see with acuteness, or to penetrate into abstruse subjects.

Your eyes are so sharp that you can not only look through a millstone, but clean through the mill.
Lily, Epiphany and his England, p. 267.

To weep or drop millstones, to be unable to emotion; remain hard and stony under or in view of the deep affliction.

Your eyes drop millstones, when fond eyes drop tears.
Shak., Rich. III. I. 3. 354.

millstone-balance (mil'stôn-bal'ans), n. A weight so placed as to balance any inequality of weight in a millstone.

millstone-bridge (mil'stôn-brîj), n. The bar crossing the eye of a millstone and supporting it on the head of the spindle; a balance-rynd. E. H. Knight.

millstone-curb (mil'stôn-kêrb), n. The covering of the stones used in grinding; a husk or hurst. E. H. Knight.

millstone-dresser (mil'stôn-dress'er), n. 1. A workman whose business is to dress millstones. — 2. A machine for forming millstones, especially for cutting the furrows on the face of a millstone. Such machines range from hand-appliances having pivoted hammers for picking and chipping the stone to large power-machines employing rotary disks and mandrels armed with diamonds or borts, and include a great variety of machines which cause cutters to travel in radial lines over the face of the stones, as well as lathes in which the stone is made to revolve before traversing tool-rests carrying cutting-mandrels in rapid revolution. Smaller machines are portable, and are guided by hand over the stone while the cutting-tool is revolved at a high speed by means of a belt.

millstone-driver (mil'stôn-dri'vër), n. The device on a millstone-spindle which drives the runner by impinging against its bail.

millstone-feed (mil'stôn-fêd), n. A device by which the quantity of grain fed to a millstone is regulated, as by means of an adjustable gate in the aperture of the hopper.

millstone-grit (mil'stôn-grit), n. A siliceous conglomerate rock, so called because it has been worked for millstones in England. It constitutes one of the members of the Carboniferous group, underlying the true coal measures, and overlying the mountain limestone. In Wales and southwestern England it is known as "farewell rock," because when the miners strike it they bid farewell to profitable work. The millstone grit is an important and prevalent member of the Carboniferous series both in Europe and in the United States. In parts of England it attains a thickness of over 5,000 feet. Where the series to which this name is given is developed to this extent, however, it contains intercalated beds of shale and clay and even of coal. In Pennsylvania the millstone grit is sometimes called the Great or Pottery Conglomerate. At Pottsville, on the eastern edge of the anthracite fields, it is over a thousand feet thick, but it thins very much in going west.

The Fourth Sand Rock in the well known No. XII, or the Great Conglomerate. It has its representation in the millstone grit beneath the European coal. It is the floor of the true coal measures an immense preparatory outspread of sand and pebble stones of every variety, but chiefly pure white quartz and of every size, from the minute muscad seed and pepper corn to the hen's egg and in the Wesphalian region even the ostrich egg.
J. P. Leakey, Coal and its Topography, p. 70.

millstone-hammer (mil'stôn ham'ër), n. Same as mill-pick.

millstone-pick (mil'stôn-pik), n. Same as mill-pick.

millstone-ventilator (mil'stôn-ven'ti-lä-tör), n. A blower and connecting pipes for forcing a blast through the eye of a runner-stone for the purpose of cooling the stones and meal.

mill-tail (mil'täl), n. The current of water leaving a mill-wheel after turning it, or the channel through which it runs; a tail-race.

The Mill tail, or Flue for the water below the wheels, is whirled up on either side with stone.
Debe. Four through Great Britain I. 366. (Davies.)

mill-tooth (mil'tôth), n. A grinder; a molar.

mill-ward (mil'wärd), n. [< ME. milward, molenward, < AS. mylenward, a miller, < mylen, mill, + ward, keeper.] The keeper of a mill.

millweir (mil'wêr), n. [*< ME. *mullweir (?), < AS. mylenwer, mylweir (= G. mühlenwehr), a millweir, < mylen, mill, + weir, a weir; see weir.] See weir.

mill-wheel (mil'hwêl), n. [*< ME. mullwehela (?), < AS. mylenwehel, mylenwehel, a mill-wheel, < mylen, mill, + wehel, wehela, wheel.] A wheel used to drive a mill; a water wheel.

mill-work (mil'werk), n. 1. Machinery used in mills or manufactories. — 2. The designing, construction, arrangement, and erection of machinery in mills or manufactories.

millwright (mil'rit), n. An engineer who designs, constructs, and erects mills, their motors, machinery, and appurtenances, particularly flouring and grist mills. Millwrights' compass. See compass.

millwrighting (mil'rit-ing), n. The work or business of a millwright.

Engineering and millwrighting, though synonymous, are often two distinct branches in a shop.
Encyclopædia, LXVII. 61.

milnet, n. An obsolete form of mill.

milord (mil'lord), n. [< F. milord, formerly also milord (Cotgrave) = Sp. milord (pl. milores), < E. my lord.] A continental rendering of the English my lord.

milrayt, n. See milleria.

milreis (mil'rês), n. [Formerly milrea, milray, milleray (F. milleret—Cotgrave); < Pg. milreia,

But Pueri, led by most mimetic eyes,
Could not despise the Puer's mimic shapes.
Killing, Albinus and Salama, p. 6. (Hera.)

Brotherhood of actors, ambitious of displaying their mimetic faculty to their townfolk.

J. D. Lusk, Amer. of Lit., 1. 302.

2. Imitating; imitative. Specifically—(a) In soöl and bot., exhibiting mimicry; characterized by mimicry, as the flowers of certain orchids which resemble better-known. See mimicry, 2.

In all these cases it appears that the mimetic species is protected from some enemy by its outward similarity to the form which it mimics.
H. A. Nicholson.

(b) In mineral., approximating closely to—that is, imitating—other forms of a higher degree of symmetry. This characteristic usually results from twinning. For example, aragonite occurs in twin crystals which at first sight appear to be hexagonal in form. See pseudosymmetry and twins.

mimetic (mi-met'i-kal), a. [mimetic + -al.] Same as mimetic.

A dialogue in the old mimetic or poetic form.

Sp. Hurd, Foreign Travel, vii.

mimetically (mi-met'i-kal-i), adv. In a mimetic manner; imitatively; in the manner of a mime.

Homer . . . wished to express mimetically the rolling, thundering, leaping motion of the stone.

De Quincey, Homer, III.

mimetism (mim'-e-tizm), n. [mimet-ic, q. v., + -ism.] Same as mimetic, and mimicry, 3.

mimetite (mim'-e-tit), n. [Gr. μιμητης, an imi-tator (see Mimetic), + -ite.] Native arseniate of lead with chlorid of lead, a mineral of a yellow to brown color occurring in hexagonal prismatic crystals, often rounded. It is isomorphous with pyromorphite, the phosphate of lead. Some varieties, as campylite, contain phosphoric acid, and hence are intermediate between mimetite and pyromorphite.
Also called mimetite, mimetite.

mimic (mim'ik), a. and n. [= F. mimique = Sp.
mimico = Pg. It. mimico, L. mimicus, Gr. μιμητης, belonging to mimes, Gr. μιμος, a mime: see mime.] 1. a. 1. Acting as a mime; given to or practising imitation; imitative: as, a mimic actor.

Off in her absence mimic Fancy wakes
To imitate her (Reason), but, adjoining shapes,
Wild work produces oft, and most in dreams.

Milton, P. L., v. 110.

2. Pertaining to mimicry or imitation; exhibiting, characterized by, or employed in simulation or mimicry: mimicking; simulating: as, the mimic stage; mimic action or gestures.

Eager to win laurels on the mimic theatre of war.

Prasch, Ford, and Isa., 1. 15.

Let the mimic canvas show
Her calm benevolent features.

Bryant, 1. 4. Ages, III.

3. Consisting of or resulting from imitation; simulated; mock: often implying a copy or imitation: as, a mimic battle; the mimic royalty of the stage.

Blow mimic footings to the silent owls,
That they might answer him.

Wordsworth, There was a Boy.

Down the wet streets
Sall their mimic fleets.

Longfellow, Rain in Summer.

Mimic-flower beetles, an occasional name of the Lagrida.

II. n. 1. One who or that which imitates or mimics; specifically, an actor.

Among his Thibae must be answered,
And forth my mimic come.

Shak., M. N. D., III. 2. 19.

Every sort

Of gymnical artists, wrestlers, riders, runners,
Juglers, and dancers, anticlers, mummery, mimics.

Milton, S. A., 1. 1225.

2. An imitation; anything copied from or made in imitation of something else.

mimic (mim'ik), v. t.; pret. and pp. mimicked, ppr. mimicking. [Gr. μιμη-, a] 1. To act in imitation of; simulate a likeness to; imitate or copy in speech or action, either mockingly or seriously.

Vice has learned so to mimic virtue that it often creeps to better under its disguise.

Steele, Spectator, No. 514.

Mimic the sly humour, furtive glance,
And brow where half was furious, half fatigued.

Browning, Ring and Book, 1. 303.

2. To produce an imitation of; make something similar or corresponding to; copy in form, character, or quality.

Fresh carved cedar, mimicking a glade
Of palm and pines, met from either side,
High in the midst.

Kenn, Lamin, 3.

Leonardo studies the laws of light scientifically, so that the proper roundness and effect of distance should be accurately rendered, and all the subtleties of nature's outlines be imitated.

J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 277.

3. Specifically, in soöl. and bot., to imitate, simulate, or resemble (something else) in form, color, or other characteristic; assume the character or appearance of (some other object). See mimicry, 3.—*Syn. 1. Ape, Mock, etc. See Mimetic.

mimical (mim'i-kal), a. [mimic + -al.] Same as mimic.

To some too, if they be far gone, mimical gestures are too familiar.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 223.

To make our mirth the completer, Sir J. Minnes was in the highest pitch of mirth, and his mimic tricks, that ever I saw, and most excellent pleasant company he is.

Pope, Essay, II. 330.

mimically (mim'i-kal-i), adv. In a mimicking or imitative manner. [Rare.]

Such are good for nothing but either mimically to imitate their neighbours' foibles, or to humiliate themselves in a kind of lascivious and debauched living.

South, Works, V. 12.

mimicalness (mim'i-kal-ness), n. The quality of being mimical. [Rare.]

mimic-beetle (mim'ik-bé'tl), n. A coleopter-ous insect which feigns death when disturbed or alarmed, as some of the Histeridæ and Byrrhidæ.

mimicker (mim'i-kér), n. One who or that which mimics.

mimicry (mim'ik-ri), n.; pl. mimicries (-ria).
[Gr. μιμη-, a] 1. The act of imitating in speech, manner, or appearance; mockery by imitation; simulation.

Absolute princes, who ruin their people by a mimicry of the great monarchs.

Hume, Essays, II. 11.

A few old men, the last survivors of our generation, . . .
will remember . . . that exquisite mimicry of Lord Holland's which enabled, instead of degrading.

Macaulay, Lord Holland.

2. An imitation; that which imitates or simulates.

In France an imitative school . . . has executed skillful mimicries of ancient glass painting.

Bryce, Brit., X. 672.

3. In soöl., the simulation of something else in form or color, etc.; mimesis. Commonly called protective mimicry, from the immunity secured by such resemblance, as when the insect known as the walking-stick simulates a dead twig of a tree, when a butterfly assimilates in color to that of the flowers upon which it habitually feeds, or a bird's nest is so constructed as to resemble a bunch of moss on a bush, etc. Also mimicisms.

Both mimicry and imitation are (here) used in a meta-phorical sense, as implying that close external likeness which causes things unlike in structure to be mistaken for each other.

A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 76.

mimic-thrush (mim'ik-thrush), n. A book-name of the mocking-bird, Mimus polyglottus.

Mimidae (mim'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., Gr. Mimus +
-idae.] The Mimidae rated as a family of oscine passerine birds.

Mimidae (mi-mi'né), n. pl. [NL., Gr. Mimus +
-idae.] A subfamily of turrid oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Mimus; the mock-ers, mock-birds, or mocking-birds. The group is variously located in the ornithological system, being sometimes placed in Turdidae, sometimes associated with the wrens in Luscinidae, and sometimes referred to the Troglodytidae under the name of American babblers. These birds have a moderate (sometimes extremely long and bowed) bill, short wings, long rounded tail, and scutellate tarsal.
Leading genera are Mimus, Harporhynchus, Oreoscoptes, Oreoscoptes. Familiar examples are the mocking-bird, thrasher, and catbird. All are confined to America. See cut under catbird and mocking-bird.

mimine (mim'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Mimidae.

mimist (mi'mist), n. [Gr. mimos + -ist.] A writer of mimes.

Thereupon were called Poets Mimistæ: as who would say, imitable and need to be followed for their wise and grace laus.

Puttenham, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 21.

mimmetion (mi-mi'shon), n. [Gr. μιμη-, a] The name of the letter m, + -ation. [Gr. μυταριον.]
The frequent use of the letter m; specifically, the addition of m to a final vowel.

The principal differences between these dialects [the Semitic-Babylonian and the Semitic-Assyrian] are 1st, the use of mimmetion by the Babylonians and not by the Assyrians, thus the Babylonian words Samirum and Akkad-dim were rendered by the Assyrians Samiri and Akkad-dim.

mim-mouthed (mim'moutht), a. [Gr. μιμη-, a] Reserved mim-mouthed; [Gr. mim + mouthed.] 1. Reserved in discourse: implying affectation of modesty.

The principal difference between these dialects [the Semitic-Babylonian and the Semitic-Assyrian] are 1st, the use of mimmetion by the Babylonians and not by the Assyrians, thus the Babylonian words Samirum and Akkad-dim were rendered by the Assyrians Samiri and Akkad-dim.

2. Affectedly moderate at table. Jamieson.

mimographer (mi-mog'ra-tér), n. [Gr. F. mimographie = Pg. mimographo; L. mimographus, a writer of mimes, Gr. μιμη-, a mime, + γραφειν, write.] A writer of mimes or farces.

For the best idea that can now be formed of the manner of this famous mimographer we must have recourse, I believe, to the Enchiridion of Theophrastus.

Pliny, tr. of Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry, I. note 4.

Mimosa (mi-mo'sá), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called from its imitating the sensibility of animal life; L. mimus, Gr. μιμος, a mimic:
see mime, n.] 1. A large genus of leguminous plants of the suborder Mimosaceæ and the tribe Eumimosaceæ, characterized by a legume with entire or jointed valves which break away from a narrow persistent placenta. The plants are either herbs, erect or climbing shrubs, or sometimes trees, and are often prickly. The leaves are almost always bipinnate, but rarely there are none, or the expanded petiole (phyllodium) takes the place of the leaf; and in many species the leaves are sensitive, closing when touched. The flowers are small and sessile, usually having the stamens very much longer than the corolla; they are arranged in globular heads or in cylindrical spikes. About 200 species have been described, natives of the warmer parts of America and Africa, of tropical Asia, and of the Mascarene Islands. Many are cultivated, the most common being the sensitive-plant or humble-plant of hot-houses, M. pudica, which is a branching annual, one or two feet in height, having a great many small leaflets, all highly sensitive when touched. M. sapientia is a woody climber of tropical America, and is remarkable for the great height which it attains, ascending to the tops of the tallest trees.
2. [L. c.] A plant of this genus.

For not Mimosa's tender tree Shrinks sooner from the touch than he.

Scott, Marmion, IV. Int.

mimosa-bark (mi-mo'sá-bark), n. The bark of several Australian acacia- or wattle-trees, much used in tanning.

Mimosaceæ (mi-mo'sé-á), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), Gr. Mimos + -aceæ.] A suborder of leguminous plants, characterized by small regular flowers with a gamosepalous calyx, by having the petals valvate and often united below the middle, and by having stamens which are free or monadelphous. It embraces 6 tribes, 20 genera, Mimosa being the type, and about 1,500 species, the majority of which are confined to the tropics.

mimosite (mi-mo'sit), n. [Gr. Mimos + -ite.]
A fossil seed-pod supposed to have belonged to a plant of the mimosa family.

mimotype (mim'o-tip), n. [Gr. μιμος, a mime, + τυπος, form.] In soöl. and zoölog., a type or form of animal life which in one country is the analogue or representative of a type or form found in another country, to which it is not very closely related. Thus, the American starlings (Stercor-aria) are mimotypes of the Old World starlings (Stercor-aria); the American genus Geomys is mimotype of the African Georchus, the American jumping mouse (Zapus) replaces the Jerboa (Dipus) of Africa.

Mimotypes, forms distantly resembling each other, but fulfilling similar functions. . . . By the use of this term, the word "analogue" may be relieved of a part of the burden borne by it. Smithsonian Report (1881), p. 449, note.

mimotypic (mim'o-tip'ik), a. [*Gr. μιμος +
-ic*.] Having the character of a mimotype.

Mimuleæ (mi-mu'le-á), n. pl. [NL. (Lentham and Hooker, 1870), Gr. Mimulus + -eæ.] A sub-tribe of plants of the order Scrophulariaceæ and the tribe Gratiolideæ, characterized by a fivetoothed calyx, by having the stamens inserted within the corolla-tube, with the anther-cells contiguous, and by a loculicidal capsule with two or four valves. The subtribe embraces 6 genera, Mimulus being the type, and about 50 species.

Mimulus (mi-mu'lus), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called from the resemblance of its corolla to a mask; L. L. mimulus, a little mime, dim. of L. mimus: see mime.] A genus of scrophulariaceous plants of the tribe Gratiolideæ, type of the subtribe Mimuleæ, characterized by a tubular calyx, which is almost always five-angled or five-toothed, by a two-valved capsule, and by having numerous seeds, with the placenta usually united to form a central column. They are reclining or erect, rarely tall, and slightly woody herbs, with opposite undivided leaves, and often showy flowers which are yellow, orange, red, violet, or rose-colored, and solitary in the axils of the leaves, or sometimes racemose at the tips of the branches.
The species, numbering 40 or 50, are especially numerous in Pacific North America, but are also widely distributed elsewhere in temperate regions, though not in Europe. Plants of the genus bear the general name of monkey flower, M.
ringens and M. alatus, with violet purple flowers, are common species of wet places in the eastern United States.
Various species are cultivated, chiefly in conservatories, some much prized. Among them are M. moschatum, the mask-plant of gardens, strongly musk-scented, the flowers small and pale yellow; M. cardinalis, with large scarlet corolla; and M. glaberrimus, a shrubby, very ornamental conservatory species, the flowers from salmon colored to scarlet.

Mimus (mi'mus), n. [NL., Gr. L. mimus, Gr. μιμος, an imitator; see mime.] A genus of American birds of which the mocking-bird, M. polyglottus, is the type. See mocking-bird, and cut under catbird.

Mimusops (mi-mu' sops), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called from the fancied resemblance of the flowers to an upturned face; < Gr. mimō, gen. of mimē, an up (cf. mimē, imitate, mimō, an imitator; see mimē), + ops, face.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants of the natural order Sapotaceae and the tribe Bumeliales. It is characterized by having the six or eight segments of the calyx arranged in two series, the outer ones including the tube, which are more slender; the lobes of the corolla entire and three times as many as the calyx segments; and the six or eight stamens, which are alternate with the same number of stamens. They are trees, or rarely shrubs, with a milky juice, and usually small white flowers, which are often fragrant, in axillary clusters. About 30 species are known, found throughout the tropics. Several, from India and Ceylon, yield a heavy durable timber, and M. elaeagnifolia produces small edible berries, the seeds of which afford an abundance of oil. See babul gum, bully-tree, cane tree, and dilly.

min', pron. A Middle English form of mini.

min' (min), n. A dialectal or affected form of man.

min. An abbreviation of mineralogy, mineralogical, minimum, minute, minim, and minor.

mina' (mī'nā), n. [L., also minā, < Gr. μῆνα, a weight, a sum of money; < Heb. maneh, a weight, prop. part. portion, number, < manah, divide, measure out, allot.] A unit of weight and of value, originally Assyrian, but used also by the Greeks and other ancient peoples. Bronze and stone Babylonian and Assyrian standards show that there were two Assyrian minas, one varying from 500 to 600 grams, and the other of half that weight. The Assyrians divided the mina into 60 shekels, and the Greeks into 100 drachms. In Athens at the time of Pericles it was in weight of silver, 180 drachms, equivalent to 436.8 grams, or 15.4 ounces avoirdupois, or 11.3 ounces troy, and was in value about $15.

[The Babylonians] constituted a new mina for themselves, consisting of 30 shekels instead of 60.

E. F. Hent, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xxxii.

mina' (mī'nā), n. Also mino, myna, mynah, and maina; < Hind. mainā, a starling.] One of several different sturnoid passerine birds of India and countries further east. (a) Any species of the genus Acridothera (which see). (b) Any species of the genus Eulabes, several of which inhabit India, Ceylon, Java, Sumatra, Borneo, etc.; a hill mina. (See hill-mina, and see under Eulabes.) The common talking starling or religious grackle of India is E. (formerly Gracula) relinquax, of a purplish black color with a white mirror on the wing, yellow bill and feet, and curious leafy lappets of a yellow or orange color on the head. It is easily tamed and taught to speak with singular distinctness. This and some other members of the same genus are common cage birds in Europe and the United States.

mina-bird (mī'nā-bērd), n. Same as mina'.
minable (mī'nā-bl), a. [mine + -able.] Capable of being mined.

He began to undermine it (finding the earth all about very minable).

That which feels, wills, and thinks: the conscious subject; the ego; the soul. Some writers make an obscure distinction between mind, soul, and spirit. With them the mind is the direct subject of consciousness.

For to say truly what is in man but his mind? which, who ever have skill to compass, and make yielding and flexible, what may not he command the body to perform?

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 164.

Mind, therefore, is to be understood as the subject of the various internal phenomena of which we are conscious, or that subject of which consciousness is the general phenomenon. Consciousness is, in fact, to the mind what extension is to matter or body. Though both are phenomena, yet both are essential qualities, for we can neither conceive mind without consciousness, nor body without extension.

By the mind of a man, we understand that in him which thinks, remembers, reasons, wills.

Reid, Intellectual Powers, I. 1.

By the Human Mind are to be understood its two faculties called, respectively, the understanding and the will.

Shoemaker, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 26.

The idea I have of the human mind, in so far as it is a thinking thing, and not extended in length, breadth, and depth, and participating in none of the properties of body, is incomparably more distinct than the idea of any corporeal object.

Descartes, Meditations (tr. by Vetch), IV.

In psychology, on the other hand, the individual mind may mean either (1.) the series of feelings, or "mental phenomena" above referred to; or (2.) the subject of these feelings, for whom they are phenomena; or (3.) the subject of these feelings or phenomena - the series of feelings or phenomena themselves, the two being in that relation to each other in which alone the one is subject and the other a series of feelings, phenomena, or objects.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 39.

Mind consists of feelings and the relations among feelings.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 41.

Whatever all men inevitably mean by the word "I" (the empirical ego of philosophy), whenever they say I think, or feel, or intend this or that; and whatever they understand others to mean by using similar language - thus much, and no more, we propose at first to include under the term mind.

G. T. Ladd, Psychol. Psychology, Int., p. 4.

Mind is the sum of our processes of knowing, our feelings of pleasure and pain, and our voluntary doings.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 2.

2. The intellect, or cognitive faculty or part of the soul, as distinguished from feeling and volition; intelligence. The old psychologists made intellect and will the only faculties of the soul.

Years that bring the philosophic mind.

Butler, Pulham, XII.

Unconscious mind. See unconscious. - Mynd, mind, intellect, soul, spirit, reason, sense, intuition. Primarily mind is opposed to matter, intellect to feeling and will, and to body, and apart to flesh. The old division of the powers of the mind was into intellect, sensibility, and will; mind is variously used to cover all or some of these, but when less than the whole is meant it is chiefly the intellect; as, he seems to have very little mind. Yet mind is sometimes used with principal reference to the will; as, I have half a mind to go. Where spirit and soul differ, spirit applies rather to moral force, and soul to depth and largeness of feeling. (See soul.) In the New Testament mind is used to translate a word covering all life, whether physical or spiritual, as in Mat. x. 28. I put the highest usage in the Scriptures is founded the common representation of man as immortal by the word soul. Hence soul is used for the central, essential, or life-giving part of anything; as he was the soul of the party. The definition under each of these words should be studied to get its range and illustrative uses. See reason.

mind¹ (mind), v. [ME. minden, munden, AS. myndgian, gemyndgian, gemyndlihan (= OHG. gemyntlihan), bear in mind, recollect, recall to another's mind, remind (cf. lecl. muna, remind, recollect, = Dan. minde, remind); from the noun: see *mind*¹, n. This verb has absorbed in part the orig. diff. verbs *mince*² (ME. minen, mynen, AS. munan) and *minye*² (AS. myneplan, myngian, bring to mind); see *mince*², *minye*².] 1. trans. 1. mine¹ (min), pron. [In defs. 1 and 2, orig. gen. of 12, < ME. min, myne, < AS. min (= OS. OFries. min = D. mijn = MIA. mun = OHG. MHG. min, G. mein (also OHG. minër, MHG. miner, G. meiner) = Ice. minn = Sw. Dan. min = Goth. meina), genitive associated with nom. ic, 1, dat. më, me, me, etc.; prob. orig. an adj., with adj. suffix -n, from the root of me: see me, 12. In defs. 3, etc., merely poss. (adj.), < ME. min, myne, mine, myne, < AS. min, etc., = Goth. meins, mine, my; from the genitive. Hence, by loss of the final consonant, my.] 1. Of me; me; the original genitive (objective) of I. It was formerly used with some verbs where later usage requires me.

I was in Surrye a yyr, and sett be myne one
 As soverayne and seynour of seer kynges londia.
Morte. Arthur (E. E. T. S.), I. 3812.

2. Of me; belonging to me. The independent possessive form of the first personal me, corresponding to my as attributive before the thing possessed: as, that (the thing spoken of or indicated) is mine (as of me, belongs to me, or is my thing); these books are all mine (my property). In this use now virtually an elliptical use of mine in def. 3.

My doctrine is not mine (of me), but his (of him) that sent me.
John vii. 16.

3. Belonging to me; merely possessive, and construed as an adjective, preceding its noun, which may, however, be omitted. When the noun is expressed, the form is in ordinary use now reduced to my, the older form mine being rarely used except archaically before a vowel or h, or by a familiar transposition after the noun, as in sister mine, baby mine, etc.

My heritage mote I neede selle,
 And ben a beggers here may I nat dwelle.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, I. 336.

I will encamp about mine house. Zeph. ix. 8.

Mam, mother mine, or mammy, as children first call their mothers.
Florio, p. 267. (Halliwell.)

All pardonato, gentle master mine.
Shak., T. of the S., I. 1. 25.

Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn but I shall have my pocket picked?
Shak., I. Hen. IV., III. 2. 92.

Mine own romantic town: Scott, Waverley, IV. 30.

We sent mine host to purchase female gear.
Tennyson, Princess, I.

Like the other possessives in the independent form, mine preceded by of constitutes a double genitive of the possessor in the first person and any word understood denoting appurtenance or possession: as, a horse of mine (belonging to me); it is no fault of mine.

Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
 To those of mine.
Shak., Hamlet, I. 4. 82.

By ellipsis, the possessive mine is used (like other possessives) - (1) To avoid repetition of the name of the thing possessed: as, your hand is stronger than mine (my hand).

Please them not fro our companye,
 Sen thynne are myne and myne or thynne.
York Plays, p. 452.

The remnant . . . shall know whose words shall stand, mine (my words), or their's.
Jer. xlv. 23.

Mine and my father's death come not upon thee.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 322.

(2) To express generally "that which belongs to me," "my possession, property, or appurtenance."

Behold me and know my right,
And to you I also years journey for ever.
Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), I. 1781.
He shall glory me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. John vi. 14.
If you like me, she shall have me and mine.
Shak., T. of the S., II. 1. 388.

Of mine. See of.
mine (mīn), n. [ME. mine, myne = D. mijn = G. Dan. mine = Sw. mina, F. mine = Sp. Pg. It. mina, ML. mina, a mine, CL. minare, open a mine, lead from place to place: see *mine*², r.]
1. An excavation in the earth made for the purpose of getting metals, ores, or coal. Mining, in metal mines, consists in sinking shafts and winzes, running levels, and sloping out the contents of the vein thus made ready for removal. In coal-mining the operations differ in detail from those carried on in connection with metal mines, but are the same in principle. The details vary in coal-mining with the position and thickness of the beds. A mine differs from a quarry in that the latter is usually open to the day; but in any mine a part of the excavations may be an openwork (see that word), as in running an adit-level, which may be carried to a considerable distance before becoming covered by earth or rock. When the term mine is used, it is generally understood that the excavation so named is in actual course of exploitation; otherwise some qualifying term like abandoned is required. No occurrence of ore is designated as a mine unless something has been done to develop it by actual mining operations. There are certain excavations which are called neither mines nor quarries, as, for instance, places where clay is being dug out for bricks; such places are frequently (especially in England) called pits, and also openworks. With few and not easily specified exceptions, a quarry is a place where building-stone, or building-materials of any kind (as lime, cement, etc.) are being got; a mine, where some metal or metalliferous ore is in the process of exploitation. In English the term mine includes excavations designated by the French as mines, as well as some of those called by them salines; quarry is the equivalent of the French carrière. The term mine is sometimes extended in use to include the ores as well as the excavation.
And all be it that men fynden gode Pyramides in Yude, sit nathelles men fynden hem more comynly upon the Riches in the See, and upon Hilles where the Mynes of Gold is.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 168.
I would not wed her for a mine of gold.
Shak., T. of the S., I. 2. 102.

2. Milit. (a) A subterranean gallery or passage dug under the wall or rampart of a fortification, for the lodgment of a quantity of powder or other explosive to be used in blowing up the works. (b) Such an excavation when charged with an explosive, or the charge of explosive used in such a mine, or sunk under water in operations of naval defense to serve a similar purpose to mines on land. The radius of explosion of such a mine is the straight line drawn from the center of the charge of a mine to the edge of the crater; the radius of rupture is the distance from the center to the curved surface to which the disturbance caused by the explosion extends.

The walls and ramparts of earth, which a mine had broken and crumbled, were of prodigious thickness.
Kedyn, Diary, Aug. 7, 1641.
With daring Feet, on springing Mines they tread
Of secret Sulphur, in dire Ambush laid.
Congreve, on the Taking of Namur.

3. Figuratively, an abounding source or store of anything.
My God, that art
The royal mine of everlasting treasure.

al so soft a powder as 30 kan.
Book of Quinte Essences (ed. Furnivall), p. 10.
Thus, with Cleveland ironstone containing after calcination some 40 per cent. of iron, about 11 cwts. of limestone are usually requisite per ton of pig iron, or about 25 per cent. of the weight of mine used.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 287.

Common mine (mīn), a mine in which the radius of the crater, or circular opening produced by the explosion, is equal to the line of least resistance—that is, the shortest line from the center of the charge to the surface of the ground.—Contact mine, a submarine mine designed to be exploded by contact with a ship's bottom or side.—Electrical mine, a charge or series of charges of explosive used for mining and exploded by electricity; a submerged torpedo which can be exploded electrically from a distant point.—Electro-contact mine, a submarine mine designed to be exploded electrically when in contact with a ship's bottom, the contact of the vessel automatically completing the electric circuit.—Electro-mechanical mine, a submarine mine differing from an electro-contact mine in that the battery is contained in the mine itself instead of being outside of it, on the shore.

Electro-mechanical mines can be made by placing a voltaic battery inside the mine itself and joining it up to a fuse and circuit-closer, the circuit-closer completing the circuit when the mine is struck. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 460.

Fairy of the mine. See fairy.—Mine-locomotive. See locomotive.—Observation mine, a submarine mine which is exploded by an operator on shore and not by contact.—Overcharged or surcharged mine (mīn), a mine that produces a crater the radius of which is greater than the line of least resistance. Submarine mine, a defensive torpedo.—The Bonanza mine. See bonanza.—Undercharged mine (mīn), a mine that upon explosion produces a crater the radius of which is less than the line of least resistance.

mine (mīn), v. [pret. and pp. mined, ppr. mining.] [ME. minen, mynen, CL. OF. miner, F. miner = Sp. Pg. minar = It. minare (= G. minen), mine, CL. ML. minare, open a mine, lead from place to place, LL. minare, drive (as by threats), CL. L. minari, threaten, CL. minare, threats: see menace; cf. minatory, etc. In part the verb is due to the noun.] 1. To dig a mine or pit in the earth, in order to obtain minerals or to make a blast for explosion, as in a military mine; work in a mine.
The enemy mined, and they countermined.
Raleigh, Hist. World, V. III. 10.

2. To burrow: form a lodgment by burrowing; as, the sand-martin mines to make a nest.—3. Figuratively, to work in secret; work by secret or insidious means.
After that his manhood and his pyne
Made love within her hearts for to mine.
Chaucer, Troilus, II. 677.
Mining fraud shall find no way to creep
Into their fenced ears with grave advice.
Sackville, Gorboduc, I. 2.

II. trans. 1. To make by digging or burrowing.
In the time of Antecrist, a Fox schalle make there his trayne, and mynen an hole, where King Aliandro leet make the Zafra.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 267.
Condemned to mine a channelled way,
O'er the solid aspects of marble gray.
Scott, Rokeby, II. 2.

2. To dig away or otherwise remove the foundation from; undermine; sap: as, to mine the walls of a fort.
Mark ye aythere over the mounten in to his mayne londez,
To Meloyne the mervaylous, and myne doune the wallen.
Morte Artours (R. E. T. S.), I. 428.

The Prussians arrived, mined the arches, and attempted to blow up the bridge, sentinels and all.
Greville, Memoirs, Dec. 10, 1820.

3. To dig mines under, for the reception of explosives, as in mining or engineering works, and in military and naval operations.
Old Parr Street is mined, sir, mined! And some morning we shall be blown into blazes—into blazes, sir, mark my words! Thackeray, Adventures of Philip, vii.
There are many places where no sort of stationary mines could possibly survive a gale, and although the waters may be reported as mined in all directions, a bold test would show them to be clear of such dangers.
N. A. Rev., CXL. 174.

4. Figuratively, to ruin or destroy by slow or secret methods.
Whiles rank corruption, mining all within,
Infects unseen. Shak., Hamlet, III. 4. 148.
Rending friends sunder,
Invidious families betraying counsels,
Whispering false lies, or mining men with praises.
B. Jonson, Volpone, III. 1.

mine (mīn), v. t. [ME. minen, mynen, muncen, CL. AN. gemynan, remember, cf. gemunan, remember: see mind, *mind*¹, *mind*², etc.] Same as *mind*¹.

mine-captain (mīn'kaptān), n. The overseer of a mine.

mine-chamber (mīn'chām'bēr), n. Milit. the place where the explosive charge is deposited in a mine.

mine-dial (mīn'dī'al), n. See dial, 8.

mine-mant (mīn'man), n. A miner.

I speak in other papers all there may be a volatile gold in some ores and other minerals, where the mine-men do not find anything of that metal. Boyle, Works, III. 60.
mineout, n. An obsolete form of *minion*¹.

1. One who mines; a person engaged in digging for metals or minerals, or in forming a military or other mine.

Myne of martial stone & many other things.
Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), I. 1582.

2. In soot, an insect that mines: chiefly in composition: as, a leaf-miner.—Mineral (mīn'g-rāl), n. and a. (= D. mineral = G. Sw. Dan. mineral, OF. mineral, F. minéral = Sp. Pg. mineral = It. minerale, a mineral, CL. ML. minerale, also minoreale, a mineral, ore, also a mine (often in pl. mineralia, mineralia), OF. mineralis, minerals, prop. neut. of mineralis, adj. (which, however, occurs much later than the noun), CL. minera, mineria (after Rom.), prop. minaria, minarium, a mine, also a mineral (> It. Sp. minera = OF. miniere, a mine, F. miniere, > G. miner, a mineral, ore), fem. and neut. respectively of an adj. minarius, pertaining to a mine (as a noun, minarius, m., a miner: see miner), equiv. to mina, a mine, CL. minare, mine, open a mine: see *mine*².] 1. n. 1. Any constituent of the earth's crust; more specifically, an inorganic body occurring in nature, homogeneous and having a definite chemical composition which can be expressed by a chemical formula, and further having certain distinguishing physical characters. A mineral is in almost every case a solid body, and, if it has been formed under suitable conditions, it has, besides its definite chemical composition, a definite molecular structure, which is exhibited externally in its crystalline form and also internally in its cleavage, heat-propagation, electricity, etc. Furthermore, it has other characters, which may belong to it even when amorphous (though sometimes modified by crystallization), as specific gravity, hardness, fracture, tenacity, luster, color, fusibility, etc. A certain variation in physical characters is consistent with the identity of a mineral species, but if the same substance, as calcium carbonate in calcite and in aragonite, occurs in two or more groups of crystals which cannot be referred to the same fundamental form, each is ranked as a distinct species. A difference in specific gravity and in some other physical characters usually accompanies the difference in crystallization. How great a variation in chemical composition, as by isomorphous replacement, is consistent with the identity of a single mineral species is a point about which opinion differs: some authors treat the garnets (all of which have the same form and the same general formula) as a group of related species, and others as varieties of a single species. Chemical compounds formed in the laboratory or in the arts are not regarded as minerals; but where such compounds are already known as occurring in nature are thus formed they are usually called artificial minerals. Much attention has been devoted of recent years to the artificial reproduction of minerals, but almost solely as a matter of scientific interest, and as throwing light on the processes of nature.
2. a. nunc. Stevens.
His very madness, like some ore
Among a mineral of metals base, Shows itself pure. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 1. 98.
Shall it not be a wild fig in a wall,
Or fired brimstone in a mineral?
Sp. Hall, Satires, vi.

Acidiferous mineral. See acidiferous.—Adipose mineral. See adipose.—Ethiops mineral. See ethiops.—Agaric, besoar, chameleon, etc., mineral. See the qualifying words. Altered mineral, one which has undergone more or less chemical change under the processes of nature. The investigation of the alteration of minerals and of the pseudomorphous minerals (see pseudomorph and pseudomorphous) thus formed is a prominent branch of mineralogy. Crystalline mineral, see crystalline, a mixture of potassium sulfate and sulphate.—Mineral deposit, any valuable mass of ore. Like ore-deposit, it may be used with reference to any mode of occurrence of ore, whether having the characters of a true, segregated, or gash vein, or of any other form in which ore is found occurring. See ore-deposit.—Torban Hill mineral. Same as fishhead coal (which see, under coal).

II. a. 1. Having the nature or character of a mineral as defined above; obtained from a mineral or minerals; belonging to the class of minerals; consisting of minerals; as, a mineral substance; the mineral kingdom. Coal dug from the earth is sometimes called mineral coal, to distinguish it from charcoal, which is artificially prepared by charring wood.
The lofty lices abound with endless store
Of mineral treasure.
Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, III.

2. Impregnated with minerals or mineral matter: as, mineral waters; a mineral spring.—Mineral acids, a name given to sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acids. Mineral alkali. Same as soda.—Mineral black, an impure variety of carbon, of gray-black color, sometimes used as a pigment.—Mineral blue. See blue.—Mineral candle. See candle.—Mineral caoutchouc, a variety of bitumen, intermediate between the harder and softer kinds. It sometimes much resembles India rubber in its softness and elasticity, hence its name. It occurs near Caudebec in Normandy. Also called elaterite.—Mineral chameleon. See chameleon.—Mineral charcoal. Same as mother-of-ash (which see, under ash).—Mineral coal. See II., 1, and coal.—Mineral cotton, a fiber formed by allowing a jet of steam to escape through a stream of liquid slag, by which the slag is blown into fine white threads. It is a poor conductor of heat, and is therefore suggested as a covering for steam boilers and pipes. (E. H. Knight.) A variety with short fiber is called mineral wool, and is used as a non-conductor of heat, a desiccator for doors of buildings, etc.—Mineral flax. See flax.—Mineral gray. See gray.—Mineral greens. See green.—Mineral kingdom.

that one of the three grand divisions of natural objects which consists of minerals or inorganic bodies, and of which mineralogy is the science as distinguished from the vegetable and animal kingdoms. — Mineral oil. Same as kerosene. — Mineral pitch, a solid softish bitumen. See naphthum. — Mineral salt, under salts. — Mineral solution, arsenical liquor, or liquor potassae arsenitis. — Mineral tallow. Same as batheletta, t. — Mineral tar, in mineral, bitumen of the consistency of tar. See asphaltum and bitumen. — Mineral waters, a name given to certain spring waters so far impregnated with foreign substances as to have a decided taste and a peculiar operation on the physical economy. The ingredients contained in the principal mineral springs of the United States are gases, carbonates, sulphates, chlorides, oxide of iron, and silica. Mineral waters may in most cases be imitated artificially. — Mineral wax. Same as asphaltum. — Mineral wool. See mineral cotton. — Mineral yellow, a pigment made of oxide and chloride of lead, obtained by digesting powdered litharge in a solution of common salt, washing, drying, and fusing the product. Also known as Turner's yellow, Mott-peller yellow, Cassel yellow, patent yellow.

mineral-dresser (min'-e-rul-dress'-er), n. A small machine for trimming geological specimens. It consists of a strong frame with two opposed chisels, between which the specimen is placed; one of the chisels, after being adjusted at the proper distance, remains fixed, while the other, which is attached to a lever worked by a screw, is pressed with great force against it.

mineral-holder (min'-e-rul-hol'-der), n. A device for exposing small pieces of stone, ores, etc., under a microscope. It consists of two clamps or spindles pivoted so that the object held in them can be revolved readily.

mineralisable, mineralisation, etc. See mineralizable, etc.

mineralist (min'-e-rul-ist), n. [F. minéraliste = It. mineralista; as mineral + -ist.] One who studies or is skilled in minerals; a mineralogist.

It is the part of a mineralist both to discover new mines and to work those that are already discovered.
Boyle, Origin of Forts, Promissory Discourse.

A mine digger may meet with a gem or a mineral which he knows not what to make of till he shows it a jeweller or a mineralist.
Boyle.

mineralizable (min'-e-rul-i-zā-bil), a. [F. minéralisable + -able.] Capable of being mineralized. Also spelled mineralizable.

mineralization (min'-e-rul-i-zā'-shun), n. [= F. minéralisation = Sp. mineralización = It. mineralizzazione; as mineral + -ation.] The act or process of mineralizing; the process of converting or being converted into a mineral, as a metal into an oxide, sulphuret, or other ore. The conversion of vegetable matter into coal is not properly mineralization, although sometimes so called. Proper mineralization of vegetable matter does take place, however, as when wood is converted into coal, or becomes silicified, as very frequently happens under certain conditions. This is commonly and properly called fossilization or petrification, and more rarely mineralization. Also spelled mineralisation.

Some phenomena seem to imply that the mineralization must proceed with considerable rapidity, for signs of a soft and uncrystalline character, and of a most perishable nature, are preserved in flint.
Lyell, Elements of Geology, I. 92.

mineralize (min'-e-rul-iz), v. [F. minéraliser, pret. and pp. minéralisé, pp. minéralisant.] [= F. minéraliser = Sp. Pg. mineralizar = It. mineralizzare; as mineral + -ize.] I. trans. To change from the metallic character to that of an ore. Thus tin, a white metal, becomes very dark-colored and unmetallic in appearance when mineralized by oxygen, as it is in the common ore of that metal.

II. intrans. To go on a mineralogical excursion; make an excursion with the view of collecting minerals.

Also spelled mineraliser.

mineraliser (min'-e-rul-i-zér), n. A substance or agent that mineralizes; a substance that combines with a metal to form an ore. The principal mineralizer is sulphur, and combinations of the metals with this substance form the most common ones, especially at some depth below the surface. Near the surface the sulphurated ores are usually found to have been changed to oxides and carbonates. Some metals (as tin) are almost exclusively mineralized by oxygen; others (as iron) are extensively mineralized by both oxygen and sulphur. Arsenic, antimony, and chlorine are other important mineralizers. Some metals (as silver) exist in combinations containing sulphur, arsenic, and antimony, all combined with the metal to form one mineral species. Also spelled mineralizer.

Silver, tin, copper, lead, zinc, and iron are obtained almost exclusively in the form of ores that is, in combination with a mineraliser, of which the most common one is oxygen.

mineralogical (min'-e-rul-og-ik), a. [= F. minéralogique = Sp. Pg. mineralógico = It. mineralogico; as mineral + -ogical.] Same as mineralological. — the mineralogical (min'-e-rul-og-ik-al), a. [F. minéralogique + -al.] Pertaining to mineralogy or the science of minerals; as, a mineralogical treatise.

mineralogically (min'-e-rul-og-ik-al-i), adv. According to the principles of, or with reference to, mineralogy.

mineralogist (min'-e-rul-og-ist), n. [= F. minéralogiste = Sp. Pg. It. mineralogista; as mineralogy + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in the science of minerals, or one who treats or discusses of the properties of mineral bodies.

The exactest mineralogists have rejected it.

Ste T. Reame, Vulg. Err., II. 1.

2. In conch., a conchologist or carrier-shell; any member of the family Xenophorida (or Phorida). See cut under carrier-shell.

mineralogize (min'-e-rul-og-iz), v. t. [pret. and pp. mineralogized, pp. mineralogizing.] [F. mineralogiser + -ize.] To collect mineralogical specimens; study mineralogy.

He was botanizing or mineralogizing with O'Toole's chaplain.
Miss Edgeworth, Ennui, xl.

mineralogy (min'-e-rul-og-ij), n. [F. minéralogie = Sp. mineralogía = It. mineralogia, for mineralologic, mineral, + Gr. λογία, logia; as mineral + -ology.] The science which treats of the properties of mineral species (see mineral), which teaches how to characterize, distinguish, and classify them, and which investigates their occurrence in nature with reference to their mode of formation (paragenesis) and the alteration which they may have undergone. Taken broadly, it includes also, as a branch, lithology, the object of which is the investigation of minerals in their mutual relations as parts of rock-masses. The investigation of rock masses with respect to their history or occurrence as parts of the crust of the earth belongs to geology. Chemical mineralogy, the investigation of the chemical composition of minerals, their method of formation, and the changes they undergo when acted upon chemically either in the laboratory or in nature. Descriptive mineralogy, that branch of the science of mineralogy which is devoted to the description of the physical and chemical properties of mineral species. — Determinative mineralogy, that branch of the science of mineralogy which has as its object the determination of mineral species by means of appropriately arranged tables, based upon their physical and chemical characters. Physical mineralogy, the science of the physical properties of minerals, that is, of their properties as related to cohesion, heat, light, electricity, etc. It includes, as special branches, crystallography and optical mineralogy.

Minerva (mī-nēr'-vā), n. [L. Minerva, Ol. Minerva, Etruscan Menrva; prob. with formative -na, *C. menes = Gr. μέν, mind, spirit, fore, etc., *C. men, think, as found in ment (mentis), mind, meminus, remember, etc.; see mind, n.] In Rom. myth., one of the three chief divinities, the other two being Jupiter and Juno. The chief seat of the cult of all three was the great temple on the Capitoline Hill. Minerva was a virgin, the daughter of Jupiter, the supreme god, and hence was identified, as the Romans came more and more under the influence of Hellenic culture, with the Greek Athena (or Athene), or Pallas, the goddess of wisdom, of war, and of the liberal arts. Like Athena, Minerva was represented in art with a grave and majestic countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and wearing long fluted drapery, and on her breast the eagle. See cut under Athena. — Bird of Minerva, the owl. — Minerva Press, a printing press formerly in Leadenhall Street, London; also, a class of ultra sentimental novels, remarkable for their intricate plots, published from about 1780 to 1810 at this press, and other productions of similar character.

minervally (mī-nēr'-vā-l), a. [F. minerval, trinitation fact, C. L. minerval, a gift in return for instruction, C. Minerva, the goddess of wisdom; see Minerva.] Entrance-money given for teaching. Railway, 1731.

The chief minervally which he bestowed upon that society.

Sp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, I. 90.

minery (mī-nēr-i), n. [mine + -ery.] Mines collectively; a mining district or its belongings; a quarry.

Near this we were shown a hill of alum, where is one of the best mineries, yielding a considerable revenue.
Bredon, Diary, Feb. 7, 1645.

minette (mī-nēt'), n. [F.] A form of syenite in which brown mien predominates.

minevert, n. An obsolete form of miner.

ming (ming), v. [pret. and pp. minged, older forms meint, meint.] Early mod. E. also minge, meint; C. ME. mengen, menzen, myngn (pp. meunged, meungt, meint, meunt). *C. And what it might be to meane the menne gan hee ask.
Alisaunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), I. 1320.

Could never man work thee a worse shame
Than once to minge thy father's odious name.
Sp. Hall, Natives, IV. II. 80.

II. intrans. To speak; tell; talk; discourse. Than tid on a time as this tale minges,
That William went til this garden his wo fort slake.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 787.

minge (ming-gh), v. [pret. and pp. mingled, pp. mingling.] Early mod. E. also mingul, menge; C. ME. mengelen (not found) = D. mengelen = MLG. G. mengeln, in comp. vermengeln, mingle; freq. of mingl.] I. trans. 1. To mix; blend; combine intimately; form a combination of.

They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall.
Mat. xvii. 34.

We'll minge our bloods together in the earth.
Shak., Pericles, I. 2. 113.

I should advise all Englishmen that intend to travel into Italy, to minge their wine with water.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 90.

He looked at her with an expression of mingled incredulity and mortification.
Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 165.

2. To form by mixing or blending; combine the parts or ingredients of; compound or concoct. Men of strength to minge strong drink. Isa. v. 22.

Flowers of more mingled hue
Than her purified scarf can show.
Milton, Comus, I. 204.

3. To bring into relation or association; connect or conjoin. Those that minge reason with your passion Must be content to think you old.
Shak., Lear, II. 4. 238.

I owe you so much of my health, as I would not minge you in any occasion of impairing it. Donne Letters, vi.

4. To confuse; impair or spoil by mixture with something. This is the mark at which the devil shooteth, to evacuate the cross of Christ, and to minge the institution of the Lord's supper. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The best of us appear contented with a mingled imperfect virtue. Reapers, Sermons.

—Syn. 1 and 2. Mingle. Mix. Blend. Minde and mix are often quite synonymous; where they differ, mix is likely to be found to indicate a more complete loss of individuality by that which is joined with something else. Blend vividly suggests the joining of two or more colors to form a third, and so a passing of two or more sounds, qualities, or the like into each other in such a way as to produce a result partaking of the qualities of each.

II. intrans. 1. To be or become joined, combined, or mixed; enter into combination or intimate relation; as, to minge with society; oil and water will not minge.

What girl! though grey
Do something minge with our younger brown, yet ha' we
A brain that nourishes our nerves.
Shak., A. and C., IV. 8. 19.

I heard the wrack,
As earth and sky would minge.
Milton, P. R., IV. 453.

2. To be formed by mixing or blending. [Rare.] Beneath the mingling line of night and day.
James Fery, Poems, p. 38.

—Syn. See 10.

Of earth and air hit is mad i-madest to-geders,
With wynt and with water ful wittillike L-madest.
Piers Plowman (A), v. 4.

Take face of beauteous
With soure ayenell, and hem togeder mengeth.
Pollidius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 28.

And so together he would minge his pride and poverte.

I owe you so much of my health, as I would not minge you in any occasion of impairing it. Donne Letters, vi.

4. To confuse; impair or spoil by mixture with something. This is the mark at which the devil shooteth, to evacuate the cross of Christ, and to minge the institution of the Lord's supper. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The best of us appear contented with a mingled imperfect virtue. Reapers, Sermons.

—Syn. 1 and 2. Mingle. Mix. Blend. Minde and mix are often quite synonymous; where they differ, mix is likely to be found to indicate a more complete loss of individuality by that which is joined with something else. Blend vividly suggests the joining of two or more colors to form a third, and so a passing of two or more sounds, qualities, or the like into each other in such a way as to produce a result partaking of the qualities of each.

II. intrans. 1. To be or become joined, combined, or mixed; enter into combination or intimate relation; as, to minge with society; oil and water will not minge.

What girl! though grey
Do something minge with our younger brown, yet ha' we
A brain that nourishes our nerves.
Shak., A. and C., IV. 8. 19.

I heard the wrack,
As earth and sky would minge.
Milton, P. R., IV. 453.

2. To be formed by mixing or blending. [Rare.] Beneath the mingling line of night and day.
James Fery, Poems, p. 38.

—Syn. See 10.

Get you gone, you dwarf,
You minimus, of hindring knot-grass made.
Shak., M. N. D., III. 2. 320.

mining (mī'ning), n. [*Verbal-n. of mine*², v.]
The business or work of a miner; also used attributively: as, a mining engineer; mining tools. — Hydraulic mining. See hydraulic. — Mining claim. (a) The claim of a discoverer, or of one who has taken possession of a mine, or unoccupied ground supposed to contain a precious metal or mineral, to the exclusive right to work it, or to a right of preemption, hence, generally, a piece of land supposed to contain a precious metal. (b) The area of mining-ground held under federal or State law by one claimant or association by virtue of one location and entry. In consequence of the peculiar right to follow a vein of ore beyond the line of the boundary upon the surface, it may be more correctly, though still somewhat vaguely, defined as a tract of mineral land, the owner of which is entitled to the surface rights and all subsequent minerals, together with certain lateral rights of mining beyond the boundary, and subject to the similar lateral rights of adjoining owners. When two veins connect or cross, priority of title generally gives a preference.
Coal-land claims may be entered for not exceeding 100 acres to each individual, or 320 acres to each association.
As to placer-mining claims, see placer-claim, under placer.
— Mining district, engineering, jurisprudence, partnership, etc. See district, etc.

Gascoigne, Philomena (ed. Arber), p. 118.

And Duncan's horses, . . .
Beautiful and swift, the minions of their race.
Shak., Macbeth, II. 4. 16.

Man's his own Minion; Man's his sacred Type;
And for Man's sake he loves his Workmanship.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 7.

2. An intriguing favorite; one who gains grace by vile or unworthy means; a servile creature.

Minion, your dear lies dead. Shak., Othello, v. 1. 33.
It was my chance one day to play at chess
For some few crowns with a minion of this king's,
A mean poor man that only served his pleasures.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, II. 1.

Hence—3. A port or saucy girl or woman; one who is too bold or forward; a mix.

Fast by her side did sit the bold Minion,
Fit mate for such a mincing minion.
Spenser, F. Q., II. II. 37.

You'll say for this minion, if I beat the door down.
Shak., C. of E., III. 1. 80.

Ever verdure with flowers and grasses,
Of sundry hews.
Puttenham, Partheniades, xl.

minion², n. An obsolete variant of minium.

Let them paint their faces with minion and ceruse, they are but fewels of lust, and signs of a corrupt soul.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 474.

minion³ (mīn'yōn), n. [Origin not ascertained.]
The siftings of ironstone after calcination at the iron-furnaces. Wreale.

minionette (mīn-yō-net'), n. and a. [*< minion*¹
+ -ette, (cf. mignonette.)] I. a. Diminutive; delicate; dainty.

His minionette face. Walpole, Letters, I. 205. (Darwin.)

II. n. In printing, a bastard body of type, measuring about 11½ lines to the inch, smaller than minion and larger than nonpareil, intended to be the equivalent of the French size "body six" of the Didot system: used by type-founders in the United States chiefly for combination borders planned on the Didot system.

minioning (mīn'yōn-ing), n. [*< minion*¹ +
-ing.] Kind or affectionate treatment.

With sweet behaviour and soft minioning.
Marton and Webster, Malcontent, IV. 3.

minionize (mīn'yōn-iz), v. t. [*< minion*¹ +
-ize.] To treat with partiality; be especially kind to; favor.

Whom of base grooves His grace did minionize.
Darwin, Holy Rood, p. 25. (Darwin.)

minion-like (mīn'yōn-lik), adv. Like a minion;
finely; daintily.

Hitherto will our sparkly youth laugh at their great-grandfather's English, who had more care to do well than to speak minion-like. Cumtun, Remains, language.

more; with the same suffix, < major, magis, greater, more; see magister, master.) Hence ministe- rium, ministry, minist'ry, ministry, minist'ry, min- ist'ry, etc.] I. One who performs service for another, or executes another's will; one who is subservient; an agent, servant, or attendant.

When the King hath don, thanne don the Lories; and after him here Mynesters and other men, all thei may have any remenant.
Manderley, Travels, p. 170.

O war! thou son of hell,
Whom angry heavens do make their minister.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 2. 34.

The word minister, in the original Sanctus, signifieth one that voluntarily doth the business of another man; and differeth from a servant only in this, that servants are obliged by their condition to what is commanded them, whereas ministers are obliged only by their undertaking, and bound therefore to no more than they have undertaken.
Hobbes, Leviathan, III. 42.

I have grounds for believing that Henry VIII. was the master, and in no sense the minister, of his people.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 220.

2. One who acts as a medium or dispenser; an administrator or promoter: as, a minister of God's will, of justice, etc.; a minister of peace or charity.

Is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.

Angels and ministers of grace defend us!

Shak., Hamlet, I. 4. 20.

All thoughts, all passions, all desires
Whatever else this mortal frame,
All are but ministers of Love,
And feed his sacred flame. Coleridge, Love.

3. In politics: (a) One of the persons appointed by the sovereign or chief magistrate of a country as the responsible heads of the different departments of the government; a minister of state; as, the minister of foreign affairs, of the interior, of finance, of war, of justice, etc.
These officers constitute the ministry or executive department of the government; at their head is the prime (first) minister, or premier, the immediate deputy or representative of the sovereign or chief magistrate; he and other ministers, selected by him, are called collectively, as his coordinate advisers in matters of policy, the cabinet.
Minister is used in most European countries as the official title of all heads of departments, but in Great Britain only in a generic sense (as, a minister of the crown), the individual ministers being officially designated the secretary of state for foreign affairs, for war, for the colonies, etc., or by other titles, as chancellor of the exchequer (minister of finance). In the government of the United States the title minister is not used at all, and there is no ministry; the corresponding officers, differing from the preceding both in mode of appointment and degree of power and responsibility, are called secretaries (of state, of the interior, of the treasury, of war, of the navy, of agriculture), post- master general, and attorney-general. See cabinet, 4.

Very different training was necessary to form a great minister for foreign affairs. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xl.

(b) A diplomatic representative of a country abroad; a person accredited by the executive authority of one country to that of another as its agent for communication and the transaction of business between the two governments; specifically, the political representative of a state in another state, in contradistinction to an ambassador, who holds a nominally higher rank as in general the personal representative of the sovereign or chief of the state at the court of another sovereign. Until 1803 the United States sent and received only ministers in this specific sense, called in full either envoys ex- traordinary and ministers plenipotentiary or ministers resident. Since that date ambas- sadors have been sent to and received from several of the principal European powers.—

4. Eccl'es., in the New Testament, a servant of God, God's word, Christ, or the church; an officer of the church; an attendant or assistant (Acts xiii. 5); translating deacon (whence de- con), but sometimes leitourgos (liturgy) or epi- tytes (an assistant); hence, any member of the ministry. The word is used of civil authorities in Rom.
xiii. 4. 6. In the ancient church minister usually meant a deacon or one in minor orders, the Latin word minister being the equivalent of the Greek diakonos. See ministry.

Those orders of Ministers in Christ's Church, — Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.

Book of Common Prayer, Pref. to Ordinal.
Mr. Williams, the teacher at Salem, was again convent-ed, and all the ministers in the bay being desired to be present, he was charged with the said two letters.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 204.

5. An officer of justice.

"I crye out on the ministers," quod he,
"That sholden kepe and rule this cite."
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 322.

6. The catfish, Amiurus nebulosus; apparently so called from the silvery white throat, contrasting with the dark back, and likened to a clergyman's white necktie. [Local U. S.]

"Horned pout," "bull-heads," or ministers, probably the hardest of all the fresh-water fish, thrive in Northern and Eastern States. Tribune Book of Sports, p. 185.

Ministers of the sick, a Roman Catholic order of priests and laymen, founded by Camillus of Lellis, to serve hospital patients. It was made a religious order by Gregory XIV. (end of the sixteenth century). — Minister's rental, in Saxo law, the rental of the parish lodged by the minister in a process of augmentation and locality. — Syn-
4. Minister, Pastor, Clergyman, Shepherd, Pastor, Priest.
Minister views a man as serving a church, pastor views him as caring for a church as a shepherd cares for sheep; clergyman views him as belonging to a certain class; divine is properly one learned in theology, a theologian; parson, formerly a respectful designation, is now little better than a jocular name for a clergyman; priest regards a man as appointed to offer sacrifice.

minister (mīn'is-ter), v. [< ME. minystran, <

2. Of or pertaining to a minister or ministry of state; belonging to executive and distinguished from legislative or judicial office: as, ministerial functions.

Very solid and very brilliant talents distinguished the ministerial benches.
Burke, Appeal to Old Whigs.

Through the power of the members of the Federal Council to attend and speak in either house, the Swiss Assembly can therefore hear . . . what in England we call a ministerial statement.
R. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 391.

3. Pertaining to the office, character, or habits of a clergyman; clerical: as, ministerial garments.

It is the inward calling of God that makes a Minister, and his own faithful study and diligence that matures and improves his ministerial gifts.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

Ministerial acts, offices, powers, in law those acts, offices, or powers that are to be performed or exercised uniformly on a given state of facts, in a prescribed manner, in obedience to law or the mandate of legal authority, without dependence on the exercise of judgment as to the propriety of so doing. Thus, the duties of a sheriff or clerk of court are chiefly if not entirely ministerial. Ministerial benches. See bench = Syn. 3. Ecclesiastical.

ministerialist (min-is-tê-ri-ál-ist), n. [= ministerial + -ist.] In politics, a supporter of the ministry in office.

Waterland.

ministering (min-is-tê-ri-ing), p. a. Attending and serving as a subordinate agent; serving under superior authority; performing personal services; tending.

Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation? Heb. 1. 14.

When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou! Scott, Marmion, VI. 20.

ministerium (min-is-tê-ri-um), n. [LL. ministerium, ministry; see ministry.] 1. In the Lutheran Church, a body of ordained ministers having the sole charge of examining, licensing, and ordaining candidates for the ministry, of conducting trials for clerical heresy, and of hearing all appeals from church councils for lay heresy. The word is also sometimes used in a more general sense, as synonymous with synod, which includes both ministers and lay delegates in one body. In such cases, however, the ministerium proper consists of the ordained ministers only.

2. A name sometimes given to the epistle corner of a Christian altar, because there the server or minister assists the priest celebrant in making preparation for offering the eucharistic sacrifice. See.

ministry, n. An obsolete form of ministry.

Milton, P. R., XII. 505.

4. The general or a particular body of ministers of religion; the ministerial or clerical class; the clergy or priesthood. In episcopal churches the ministry consists of bishops, priests, and deacons, and of subdeacons and the minor orders, when such exist, in addition to these.

5. The body of ministers of state in a country; the heads of departments collectively; the executive administration: as, to form a ministry; the policy of the British ministry; the French ministry has resigned. In the United States the corresponding body is called the cabinet.

The word Ministry was not then in use, but Councilors or Courtiers. For the King himself (Charles II.) then took so much upon him that the ministers had not that aggregate title. Roger North, Examen, p. 68. (Davies.)

The first English ministry was gradually formed; nor is it possible to say quite precisely when it began to exist.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xxi.

6. A ministerial department of government; the organization of functionaries administering a branch of public affairs; a minister and his subordinates collectively: as, the ministry of war or of justice.

Immediately below these three institutions stand the ministries, ten in number. D. M. Wollast, Russia, p. 190.

ministryship (min-is-tri-ship), n. [OF. ministrie + -ship.] The office of a minister; ministry. [Rare.]

minium (min-i-um), n. [Formerly also minion, < OF. minion, F. minium = Sp. Pg. It. minio; < L. minium, native cinnabar, red lead; said to be a Spanish (Hispanic) word. Hence miniate, minature.] Red oxide of lead, Pb₂O₃, produced by maintaining the protoxide (litharge) at a low red heat for some time in presence of air. It is a bright-orange granular powder, used as a pigment and in the manufacture of flint-glass. See vermillion. Iron minium, a name given to a large number of substances used as paints, especially for iron-work and sea-going vessels. Oxidized minium, a dried composition consisting of lead nitrate, lead peroxide, and undecomposed minium, obtained by drying a magma of minium and nitric acid.

miniver (min-i-vér), n. [Formerly also miniver, meniver, dial. minifer; < ME. meniver, menyver, < OF. menu ver, menu vair, a grayish fur, miniver, also "the beast that bears it" (Colgrave), lit. little vair; menu, little; vair, a kind of fur; see minule and vair.] 1. A mixed or spotted fur once commonly used for lining or trimming garments. According to Colgrave, it was "the fur of ermine mixed or spotted with the fur of the weasel called gris"; but according to Planche, miniver was the white part only of the patchwork designs of different furs in use at certain epochs during the middle ages, as is seen in the heraldic furs, which retain the designs most commonly used at that time.

A burnet coat hung therewith all,
Furred with no miniver.
Rum. of the Run, I. 321.

He lists not toll of unches rare,
Of marbles green, and bradded hair,
And kirtles furred with miniver.
Scott, L. of L. M., VI. 4.

2. In her, a fur like vair, with the peculiarity that the escautcheon-miniver contains six or more horizontal rows of spots.—3. The Siberian squirrel, which has fine white fur; also, the fur itself.

minivet (min-i-vet), n. One of various canniphagine birds of the genus Perisoreus.

mink (mink), n. [Formerly also minx (appar. an error); appar. < Sw. mink, a mink (Putorius lutreola), transferred from the European mink to the American species.] 1. An American digitigrade carnivorous quadruped of the family Mustelidae, Putorius (Lutreola) vison, of semi-aquatic habits. The mink belongs to the same genus as the skunk and weasel, but to a different subgenus, its form being modified in adaptation to its aquatic habits, in which respect it approaches the otter. It was once called lener otter. It is larger and stouter than any skunk, with shorter ears, uniformly bushy tail, and half webbed feet; the color is rich dark chestnut-brown, blackening on the back and tail; the chin, and usually some irregular patches on the throat, breast, or belly, are white. It is 15 to 18 inches long, the tail 6 or 8 inches more. It is found everywhere in North America in suitable places; its fur is valuable, and the animal is systematically trapped, especially in British America. Like the cat, the mink exhales a strong musky odor, and is destructive to poultry. It has been tamed, and bred in menageries, like the ferret. The little black or mountain mink, described by Audubon and Bachman as a distinct species P. nigriventer, is a small dark variety. The corresponding animal in Europe is P. lutreola, commonly called neut or moor, and by the Swedish name mink (sometimes mink); the designation European mink being a late book name. It is much like the American mink, but its average size is smaller, and it usually has the upper lip as well as the chin white, and presents certain dental peculiarities. The Siberian mink, lately so called, is the Kulon, P. abieticus, a quite different species. Also called moor.

2. Name as English (mink). [mink (mink-er), n.; pl. minkeries (-iz).] [mink + -ery.] An establishment where minks are bred and trained for ridding, like the ferret.

Mr. Remarque's minkery consisted of twelve stalls, each twelve feet square, of staid soil, and surrounded with a fence, and some special precautions to prevent the escape of the animals.

Cowen, For Bearing Animals (ed. 1877), p. 182.

minnet, n. and v. See min.

minne-drinking (min'-e-drink-ing), n. [(t. minne, love, + E. drinking, verbal n. of drink, v.)] Originally, a heathen practice among the Teutonic nations at grand sacrifices and banquets, in honor of the gods or in memory of the absent or deceased. This custom was sanctioned by the church, the salute being substituted for the gods, and was especially consecrated to St. John the Evangelist and to St. Gertrude. Traces of it are still found in certain localities of Germany.

Minne drinking, even as a religious rite, apparently exists to this day in some parts of Germany. At Oberbergen, a village of Hildesheim, on Dec. 27 every year a chalice of wine is hallowed by the priest, and handed to the congregation in the church to drink as John's egen (blessing).

Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 62.

minnekint, n. An obsolete form of minikin.

minnelled (min'-e-let), n. [(t. minne, love, + E. song.)] A love song.

The first lyrical writer of Holland was John I, duke of Brabant, who practised the minnelled with success.

Roscoe, Brit., XII. 30.

minnepoetry (min'-e-po-er-i), n. The poetry of the minnesingers.

The classical representative of Minnepoetry, Walther von der Vogelweide.

Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 154.

minnesinger (min'-e-sing-er), n. [(t. minne, love, + singer, a singer.)] One of a class of German lyric poets and singers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so called because love was the chief theme of their poems. They were chiefly or exclusively men of noble descent—knights, nobles, princes, and even emperors. They sang their pieces to their own accompaniment on the lute, and often engaged in poetical contests for the gratification of princes and ladies of the court. Among the chief seats of the minnesingers were Swabia and Austria, and the leading dialect used was the Swabian. The minnesingers were succeeded by the Meistersingers. See Meister.

Minnesotan (min'-e-so-tan), n. [(t. Minnesota (see def.) + -an.)] A native or an inhabitant of Minnesota, a northwestern State of the United States, north of Iowa.

minnet (min'-et), n. See minnet.

minnie (min'-i), n. A dialectal form of minnow.

minnie (min'-i), n. [(Dim. of min.)] A childish word for mother. [Scotch.]

Bad luck on the penny that tempted my minnie
To sell her poor Jenny for siller an' lan'!

Burns, What Can a Young Lassie.

minnikint, minnikent, n. and n. Obsolete forms of minikin.

minning (min'-ing), n. [(ME. minnyng; verbal n. of min.)] Reminding.

minning-day (min'-ing-dä), n. [(ME. minnyng-day.)] The anniversary of a death, on which the deceased was had in special remembrance, and special offices were said for his soul. See a year's mind, under mind.

All the day and night after the burial they use to have excessive ringings for ye dead, as also at the twel-monthes day after, which they call a minnyng-day.

Chesham New, . . . xv. (Y and Q, 7th ser., III. 448.)

minnis (min'-is), n. [(t. minnow.)] The stickle-back. [Local, Eng.]

minnow (min'-o), n. [Formerly also minow, minoe, menow, etc.; also dial. minny, minnie (cf. equiv. dial. minim, minnan, mennam, mennom, appar. conformed to L. minimus, least: see minim); < ME. menow, a minnow, appar. < AS. mine, myne (pl. mynas), a minnow (glossed by ML. mini); possibly from the root of min, less, with ME. term. ow due to confusion with some other word, perhaps OF. menu, small; cf. ME. menuse, small fish, < OF. menuse (ML. menusa), small fish collectively, < L. minutus, small; see menuse.] 1. The smallest of the British cyprinoid fishes, Phoxinus

Common English Minnow (Phoxinus phoxinus)

aphysa or larva. Artificial minnows are used by anglers for trolling, spinning, or casting, and are made of metal, glass, and rubber, alided, silvered, or painted attractively.

Hear you this Triton of the minnows?
Shak., Cor., III. 1. 80.

2. In the United States, one of many different fishes of small size. (a) Any cyprinoid of the genus Phoxinus, of which there are several species, from 1 1/2 to 3 inches long, in the Mississippi basin and westward, as P. nageus, P. phoxinus, P. phyllophorus. This is the correct use of minnow, though in popular speech it extends to various other little cyprinoids, also loosely called roach, duer, shiner, etc. Among these may be mentioned the red minnow of the genus Chrosomus, as C. erythrogaster, one of the prettiest of all, 2 or 3 inches long, the silvery minnow, Hypoclinemus nuchalis, and others of this genus, the black headed minnow or fathead, Pimephales promelas; the blue nosed minnow, Hypoclinemus nuchalis; the Texas hardmouth minnow, Cochlosynche crinitus; the bull headed and straw colored minnows, Gladiolus tataricus and C. stramineus; the spotted-tail, C. strimatus, and more than 10 other kinds of Gladiolus; about 50 others of the genus Minnow; various species of the genera Rhinichthys, Cerichthys, Apoecichthys, etc. These abound in fresh waters of the United States, and minnow is the usual name of all those which have not more particular designations. (b) One of numerous small cyprinoid fishes, otherwise known as killifishes and minnowches, and more fully called top minnows, as Zemphelus notatus and many others of this genus. The most abundant of these is Fundulus heteroclitus, found in brackish waters from Maine to Mexico, and sometimes specified as mill water minnow. P. diaphanus is the spring minnow. (c) Any American member of the family Limnodynastidae and genus Umbra or Notropis, as U. limnodynastes, more fully called minnow, 4 inches long, found from New England to Minnesota and South Carolina, often in mere mud holes which would hardly be expected to lodge any fish. It is closely related to P. crassus of Austria. (d) One of various small viviparous perches or ambloplites fishes of California, chiefly of salt water, as the spratling, Microstomus xanthurus, etc. (e) One of several small ankers or catostomid fishes; a loach, etc.

minnow-harness (min'-o-har-nes), n. An artificial built used for trolling to which a minnow can be attached.

minny (min'-i), n. A provincial form of minnow.

minno (min'-o), n. [Jap.] A thatch-like rain-coat or cape made of hempen fibers, long grass, rushes, or the like laid close together, and bound in place at the top by plaiting or by some similar means: used in Japan by coolies, farm-laborers, etc.

mino (mi'-o), n. A variant of mino.

minor (mi'-nōr), a. and n. [(ME. minor, minor, < OF. minor, F. minor = Sp. Pg. menor = It. minore, < L. minor (neut. minus), less, compar. (with superl. minimus, least: see minus, minimum, etc.) associated with adj. parvus, small; = AS. min = OS. miniro, etc., less; see min.)] 1. Smaller (than the other); less; lesser: applied definitively to one of two units or parts, and opposed to major or greater; as, the minor axis of an ellipse; the minor premise of a syllogism; the minor part of an estate.

They altered this custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protest.

Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

2. Smaller than others; of inferior rank or degree; lower; hence, small; inconsiderable; not capital, serious, or weighty; as, the minor officers of government; a minor canon; the minor points of an argument; minor faults or considerations.

Now from menour, now jacobyne:

Item, of the Row, I. 622.

Neither in the name of multitude do I only include the base and minor sort of people.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II. 1.

Inconsistency with respect to questions of minor importance is not likely to be regarded as dishonourable.

Macaulay, Sir W. Temple.

3. Under age. [Rare.]

At which time . . . the king was minor.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 148.

4. In music: (a) Of intervals, less; shorter; smaller (as compared with major intervals). The word is more often applied to seconds, thirds, sixths, sevenths, ninths, etc., designating an interval equal to the corresponding major interval less one half-step. It has also been applied of late to fourths, fifths, and eighths, and is then equivalent to the older term diminished. Finally, it is used to designate the smaller of two intervals that differ by a minute quantity, as a minor tone (10:9), which is a comma less than a major tone: opposed to major. See interval, 5. (b) Of tonalities and scales, characterized by a minor third and also usually by a minor sixth, and often a minor seventh: opposed to major. See key, tonality, scale. (c) Of triads and chords generally, characterized by a minor third between the lowest and the next to the lowest tones: opposed to major. See triad, and chord, 4. (d) Of modes, characterized by the use of a minor tonality and of minor cadences: as, the piece is written throughout in the minor mode: opposed to major. See major, 4.

Bob minor. See bob, 7. - Minor abstraction. See abstraction. Minor axis, same as conjugate axis (which see under axis). Minor canon, determinant, communication. See the noun. Minor orders (eccl.). See order. Minor premise, that premise which contains the minor term. This is the usual definition, but there has been much dispute on the subject. See major, 5.

Minor prophet, a name given collectively to twelve prophetic Old Testament books, from Hosea to Malachi, inclusive, and their authors. See prophet. - Minor term, in logic, the subject of the conclusion of a categorical syllogism.

II. n. 1. A person of either sex who is under age; one who is of less than the legal age for the performance of certain acts; one under the authority of parents or guardians, because of not having reached the age at which the law permits one to make contracts and manage one's own property: an infant in the legal sense. In Scots law, minor, when used in contradistinction to propter, signifies a person above the age of puberty (twelve in females and fourteen in males) and under that of majority, which in both sexes is twenty-one years. The technical term in English and United States law for one under the age of legal capacity (twenty-one years) is infant, but minor is used in the same sense in general literature. Compare age, n., 3.

Long as the year's dull circle seems to run,
When the brisk minor pants for twenty-one.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. 1. 20.

King Henry, although old enough at seven to be crowned, was still a minor.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 173.

2. In logic, the minor term, or the minor premise. See L—3. In music, the minor mode or a minor tonality or minor chord taken absolutely.

In all your music our pathetic minor
Your ears at all cross.

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

4. [cap.] A Franciscan friar; a Minorite; so called from a name of the Franciscan order, Frater Minor, or Lesser Brother. Also called Friar Minor. - Minor of a determinant. See determinant. - Boys minor, a species of moth. See Boys. minorate (mi'-o-rat), v. t. [(LL. minoratus, pp. of minorare < It. minorare = Sp. Pg. menorar, make less, diminish, < L. minor, less: see minor.)] To diminish.

Which it sense: doth not only by the advantage of substance of a tale, but by less industrious explication, showing in what degree distance subverts the object.

Ranville, Vanity of Imagining, VII.

minorative (mī-nō-rā-tiv), a. [= F. minoratif = Sp. minorativo = Pg. minorativo = It. minorativo, < L. minorativus (a.), diminution, < minorare, diminish: see minorate.] 1. A lessening; diminution.

We now do hope the mercies of God will consider our degenerated integrity unto some minoration of our offences.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., l. 2.

2. In med. mild purgation by laxatives. minorative (mī-nō-rā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. minoratif, minorative, = Sp. Pg. minorativo, lessening, = It. minorativo, minorative; as minorativus (a.) + -ice.] 1. a. Mildly laxative: applied to certain medicines.

II. n. A mildly laxative medicine.

For a minorative or gentle potion he took four hundred pound weight of colophonous scammony.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, II. 33. (Darcey.)

minorese (mī-nō-rē-sē), n. [minor + -ese.] 1. A female under age.—2. A nun under the rule of St. Clare. (Tyrrhiff.) [This word is found in the early printed editions of the "Roman of the Rose," l. 140. Minorese appears in modern editions taken from the original French (Rom. of the Rose, l. 141).]

Minorite (mī-nō-rīt), n. and a. [minor + -ite.] 1. n. A Franciscan friar; a Minor. See minor, n., 4.

Some minorite among the clergy.

Hp. Hacket, Abp. William, II. 202. (Darcey.)

II. a. Belonging to the Franciscans.

Few movements within the bosom of the Church were more pregnant with auspicious augury for its reformation than the rise of the Minorite order.

J. Green, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 281.

minority (mī-nō-rī-tē), n.; pl. minorities (-tī-z). [= F. minorité = Pr. menoritat = Sp. minoridad = Pg. minoridade = It. minorità, < ML. minoritas (a.), a being less, minority, < L. minor, less: see minor.] 1. The state of being minor or smaller.

From this narrow time of gestation [may] ensue a minority or smallness in the conclusion.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., lib. 6.

2. The minor part in number; the smaller of two aggregates into which a whole is divided numerically; a number less than half; opposed to majority.

That minority of the Scottish nation by the aid of which the government had hitherto held the majority down.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., VI.

Remember, sir, that everything great and excellent is in minority.

Emerson, Address to Kinsmen.

Specifically—3. The smaller of two related aggregates of persons; the minor division of any whole number of persons; as, the rights of the minority, government by minorities.

To give the minority a negative upon the majority, which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision, is to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser.

A. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. 22.

4. The state of being a minor or not come of age, and therefore legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts; the period or interval before one is of full age, generally the period from birth until twenty-one years of age (see age, 3); in Scots law, the interval between puberty and majority. See minor, n., 1.

What mean all these hard restraints and shackles put upon us in our minority.

minorship (mī-nō-rē-ship), n. [minor + -ship.] The state of being a minor.

Minotaur (mī-nō-tār), a. [ME. Minotaur, < OF. Minotaure, F. Minotaure = Sp. Pg. It. Minotaurus, < L. Minotaurus, < Gr. Minotaurus, the Minotaur, appar. < Minos, Minos, a legendary king and lawgiver of Crete, + tauros, a bull. But this is perhaps a popular etym. of some name not understood.] In Gr. myth., a monster represented as having a human body and the head of a bull, who was the offspring of Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, and a bull sent by Poseidon. He was confined in the Cretan labyrinth and fed with human flesh, devoured the seven youths and seven maidens whom Minos compelled the Athenians to send him periodically as tribute, and was killed by the hero Theseus, a neighbor of the last company so sent, who escaped from the labyrinth by the aid of Ariadne, daughter of Minos. Hence, in modern literature, the name is used to characterize any devouring or destroying agency of which the action is in some way comparable to that attributed to the Cretan monster.

And by his [Theseus's] banner born he his penous Of gold-fil'd riches, in which there was his beto The Minotaur which that he slough in Crete.

minstrel, n. A Middle English form of minstrel. minstrel, n. [Appar. irreg. < minst, mince, + -strel.] Mining; affected; servile.

Never say, your lordship, nor your honour; but you, and you, my lord, and my lady: the other they count too simple and minstrel.

R. Jonson, Footnote, IV. 1.

minster (mīn'stēr), n. [ME. minster, mynstre, munster, menstre, etc., < AS. mynster = D. munster = MLG. munster = OHG. munstari, munstri, monastri, MHG. monaster = OF. monastier, monastier, F. monastier, < L. monasterium, < Gr. monastērion, a monastery: see monastery.] Originally, a monastery; afterward, the church of a monastery; also, from the fact that many such churches, especially in Great Britain, became cathedrals, a cathedral church which had such an origin; as, York minster; hence, any cathedral; as, the minster of Strasburg. It is found also in the names of several places which owe their origin to a monastery: as, Westminster, Leominster.

The same night the kyngs commanded the children to go wake in the selfe minster till on the morrowe be fore messe, that no longer he wolde abide.

minstrael, n. An old form of minstrel.

minstrel (mīn'strēl), n. [ME. minstrel, mynstrelle, minstral, mynstrel, menstral, munstral, munstrail, munstrel, < OF. menestral, menestral, menestrel, F. menestrel = Pr. menestral = Sp. menestral, menestrel, minstrel = Pg. minstrel, menestrel, minstrel = It. minstrello, minstrello, < ML. minstralis (also, after Rom., minstrelus), a servant, retainer, jester, singer, player, < L. ministerium, a servant, attendant: see minister. Cf. ML. ministerium in same sense, < ministerium, service: see minister.] 1. A musician, especially one who sings or recites to the accompaniment of instruments. Spec. itally, in the middle ages, the minstrels were a class who devoted themselves to the amusement of the great in castle or camp by singing ballads or songs of love and war, some times of their own composition, with accompaniment on the harp, lute, or other instrument together with suitable mimicry and action, and also by story telling, etc. The intermediate class of professional minstrels from which the later minstrels sprang appeared in France as early as the 11th century, and was by the 13th century introduced into England, where it was assimilated with the Anglo-Saxon gleemen. Every where the social importance of the minstrels slowly degenerated until in the fifteenth century they had formed themselves generally into guilds of itinerant popular musicians and mountebanks. In England they fell so low in esteem that in 1507 they were classed by a statute with rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars, but in France their guilds were maintained until the revolution. See gleeman, troubadour, trouwer, and jongleur.

But while the minstrel proper accompanied his lord to the field and shared with him the danger and the honour of his warlike exploits, the connection between him and the lumber kind of entertainer (the jongleur) who was still the servant of the multitude rather than of a particular lord, cannot have been wholly forgotten.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., l. 13.

Hence—2. Any poet or musician. [Poetical.]

—3. Originally, one of a class of singers of negro melodies and delineators of life on the Southern plantations which originated in the United States about 1800: called negro minstrels, although they are usually white men whose faces and hands are blackened with burnt cork. The characteristic feature of such a troupe or band is the middle man or interlocutor, who leads the talk and gives the cues, and the two end-men, who usually perform on the tambourine and the bones, and between whom the indispensable comedians and jokes are exchanged. As now constituted, a negro-minstrel troupe retains but little of its original character except the black faces and the old jokes.

minstrel-squire (mīn'strēl-akwēr), n. A minstrel who was attached to one particular person.

Minstrel (mīn'strēl), n. [ME. minstrel, mynstrelle, minstral, mynstrel, menstral, munstral, munstrail, munstrel, < OF. menestral, menestral, menestrel, < OF. menestral, menestrel: see minstrel.] 1. The art or occupation of minstrel; singing and playing in the manner of a minstrel; lyrical song and music.

Cf. money, a doublet of mint.] 1. A coin; coin; coined money; money.

These if we spende, or want for their money,
The sommer wol they bryngme anyne and bryng Forth pluggyn.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 20.

2. A place where money is coined by public authority. The coining of money is now considered a prerogative of government. In early times there were many mints in England, but now the only one in that country is the Royal Mint, Tower Hill, London. The United States Mint was established by act of April 21, 1792, and located at Philadelphia. Other mints have since been established at San Francisco, New Orleans, Carson City, and Denver (but the last two are properly speaking, assay offices). The United States Mint is a bureau of the Treasury Department, under the charge of an officer called the Director of the Mint.

And so (upon the matter) to set the mint on work, and to give way to new coins of silver, which should be so minted.

Baron, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 210.

In one higher room of this Mint . . . I saw fourteen marvellous strong chests . . . in which he kept nothing but money.

Carroll, Condition, l. 242.

3. Figuratively, a source of fabrication or invention.

And have a mint in their pragmatick heads of such superabundant invention

Purcell, Pilgrimage, p. 200.

The busy mint

Of our laborious thoughts is ever going.

And adding new devices. Quarles, Emblems, II. 2.

4. A quantity such as a mint turns out; a great supply or store; as, a mint of money.

And so called and so called with a mint of money.

J. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doona, p. 129.

5. [cap.] A place of privilege or asylum in Southwark, London, near the Queen's Prison, where persons sheltered themselves from justice, under the pretext that this place was an ancient palace of the crown. (Hapsburg and Leicester.) The privilege is now abolished.—

Master of the mint, an officer in the English administration who presided over the mint. The office has been abolished, the mint being now under the direct control of the chancellor of the exchequer. Warden of the mint, formerly an officer of the English mint next in rank to the master. He collected the seigniorage, and superintended the manufacture of the coin.

mint¹ (mint), v. t. [< ME. "minter, mynten, < AS. myntian (= OS. muniton = OFries. montia, muntia = D. MLG. munten = OHG. munizon, MHG. G. münzen = Sw. mynta = Dan. mynte), coin, < mynet, a coin: see mint¹, n.] 1. To coin; stamp and convert into money.

Silver and gold coins, then minted of purpose, was cast among the people in great quantities.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 467.

A sovereign prince calls in the good old money . . . to be new marked and minted.

Laurel, Ellis, p. 218.

2. To invent; forge; fabricate.

Look into the titles whereby they hold those new portions of the crown, and you will find them of such natures as may be easily minted.

mint² (mint), n. [< ME. minter, mynte, mente, < AS. minter = MD. D. munt = Lat. mynte, minter = OHG. minza, muntia, MHG. G. münze, münze = Iscl. mintia = Sw. mynta = Dan. mynte (= F. menthe, > Sp. L. menta), < L. menta, mentha, < Gr. ψιθία, ψιθία, mint.] 1. A plant of the genus Mentha. The most familiar species are the peppermint, M. piperita, and the spearmint (garden mint, blackberry mint), M. viridis, well known as medicines and condiments. The bergamot mint, affording a perfume's oil, is M. aquatica, the clipped or curled mint, the variety crispata of the same. The water mint (or brook mint) of older usage was M. sylvestris, now called horrmint. The corn-mint is M. arvensis. The pennyroyal-mint or pennyroyal is M. pulegium, that is, flea-mint. The whorled mint is M. sativa; the wild mint of the United States, M. Canadensis. See out under Mentha.

Wyth grete wrath he cam mynte,

But he fayled of his dynite.

MS. Cantab., ff. 11, 24, f. 180. (Hallivell.)

They that set at a gown of gold will always get a sleeve of it.

Scott, Monastery, xvii.

2. To insinuate; hint. [Scotch.]

mintage (min'tāj), n. [< mint + -age. (Cf. F. monnayage = It. monetaggio, < ML. monetagium, < L. moneta, money: see money, monetage.) 1. The act of coining or fabricating; formation; production by or as if by minting.

Few literary theories of modern mintage have more to recommend them. Maime, Early Law and Custom, p. 15.

The chief place of mintage in those regions was the great trading and colonizing city of Mexico.

B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xlv.

2. That which is minted, or formed by or as if by coining or stamping; hence, a fabrication or manufacture; a coinage.

Stamped in clay, a heavenly mintage.

Sterling.

Of one of his mintages [colored words] Mr. Roode is, apparently, not a little proud.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 35.

3. The charge for or cost of minting; the duty or allowance for coinage; seigniorage on coins.

Some small savings would accrue from the less amount of mintage required.

Jeans, Money, p. 168.

mint-bush (mint'bus), n. A plant of the Australian genus Prostanthera.

mint-drop (mint'drop), n. 1. A sugar-plum flavored with peppermint. — 2. A coin. [Slang. U. S.]

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 247.

mintman (mint'man), n. A coiner; one skilled in coining or in coin.

Let such as are to inform councils out of their particular professions (as lawyers, sea men, mint-men, and the like) be first heard before committers.

Bacon, Of Counsel (ed. 1857).

mint-mark (mint'mark), n. A private mark put upon coins by the mint authorities for purposes of identification. Sometimes this mark indicates the place of mintage, as "M" on certain sovereigns of Queen Victoria, denoting that the pieces were coined at Sydney in Australia, sometimes it relates to the mint-master or other official.

mint-master (mint'mas'ter), n. [= D. muntmeester = MHG. G. münzmeister = Sw. myntmästare = Dan. myntmester; as mint + master.] 1. The master or superintendent of a mint.

That which is coined, as mintmesters confessed, is alloyed with about a twelfth part of copper.

Boyle.

2. One who invents or fabricates.

That the Jews were forward Mint-Masters in this new-coined Religion of Mahomet. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 263.

minuend (min'g-ēnd), n. [< L. minuendus, to be diminished, gerundive of minuere, lessen: see *minute*¹.] In arith., the number from which another number is to be deducted in the process of subtraction.

minuet (min'ū-et), n. [= *Sp. minuet, minué = Pg. minuet = It. minueto, < F. menuet, a dance so called from the small steps taken in it, < menuet, smallish, little, pretty, thin (Cotgrave), dim. of menu, small. < L. minutus, small: see minute*¹.] 1. A slow and graceful dance, invented, probably in Poitou, France, about the middle of the seventeenth century. Throughout the eighteenth century it was the most popular of the more stately and ceremonious dances. — 2. Music for such a dance, or in its rhythm, which is triple and slow. Minuets are frequently found in the old suite, and also in the later sonata and symphony. They properly consist of two contrasted sections of sixteen measures each, the second of which is generally called a trio, because originally written for but three instruments; but this regular form is often considerably modified. Beethoven was the first to replace the minuet in the sonata and the symphony by the schœn, which resembled the minuet somewhat in rhythm, but was more sprightly and unrestricted in form and spirit.

minum, n. An obsolete form of minim. Cotgrave.

minus (mī'nus), a. [< L. minus, neut. of minor, less: see minor.] 1. Less (by a certain amount): followed by a noun as an apparent object (a preposition, by, to be supplied): as, the net amount is so much minus the waste or tare; 25 minus 9 is 16. In algebra and arithmetic this sense is indicated by the sign —, called the minus sign or sign of subtraction: as, $a - b = c$, which is read "a minus b equals c"; 25 - 9 = 16.

2. Less than nothing; belonging to the inverse or negative side, as of an account; lying in the direction from the origin of measurement opposite to ordinary quantities; below zero, or below the lowest point of positive or upward reckoning: as, a minus amount or sum (that is, an amount or sum representing loss or debt); a minus quantity in an equation (that is, one having the minus sign before it); the temperature was minus twenty degrees (written — 20°, and read "twenty degrees below zero"). In some common mathematical phrases, minus seems to be used as an adverb modifying the numeral adjective. Thus astronomers speak of the year minus 664 of the Christian era, meaning 664 B. C.

3. Marking or yielding less than nothing or less than zero; negative in value or result: as, the minus sign (see def. 1). — 4. Deprived or devoid of; not having; without, as something necessary: as, he escaped minus his hat and coat; a gun minus its lock. [Colloq. or humorous.] — 5. Lacking positive value; wanting. [Colloq.]

His mathematics are decidedly minus, but the use of them is not long ago. C. A. Bristol, English University, p. 74.

Minus acceleration. See acceleration (b).

minuscule (mī-nus'kū-lē), n.; pl. minuscules (-lē). [NL.; see minuscule.] Same as minuscule.

minuscule (mī-nus'kū-lē), a. and n. [= F. minuscule = Sp. minuscule = Pg. It. minuscule, < NL. minuscule (sc. littera), fem. of L. minusculus, rather small; dim. of minor, minus, less: see minor, minus. Cf. majuscule.] 1. a. Small; of reduced form, as a letter; of or pertaining to writing in minuscule.

Minuscule letters are cursive forms of the earlier uncials. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 71.

II. n. The kind of reduced alphabetical character which, originating in the seventh century, was from about the ninth substituted in writing for the large uncial previously in use, and from which the small letter of modern Greek and Roman alphabets was derived; hence, a small or lower-case letter in writing or printing, as distinguished from a capital or majuscule.

The minuscule arose in the 7th century as a cursive monastic script, more legible than the old cursive, and more rapidly written than the uncial, and constructed by a combination of the elements of both.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 160.

The period of the uncials runs from the date of the earliest specimens on papyrus to the 9th century, that of the minuscule from the 9th century to the invention of printing.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 146.

minutary (min'ū-tā-ri), a. [*< minute*², n., + -ary.] Consisting of minutes. [Rare.]

minute¹ (mī-nūt'), a. [= F. menu = Pr. menuit = Sp. menuito = Pg. minudo = It. minuto, < L. minutus, little, small, minute, pp. of L. minuire, make smaller, lessen, diminish, < minu-, stem of minor, smaller, less, minimus, smallest, least: see minor and min².] 1. Very small, diminutive, or limited; extremely little in dimensions, extent, or amount.

We have also glasses and means to see small and minute bodies perfectly and distinctly.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

He was fond of detail — no little thing was too minute for his delicate eye.

Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, Washington.

2. Very small in scope or degree; relating to or consisting of small points or matters; particular; closely precise or exact: as, minute details of directions; minute criticism. — 3. Attending to very small particulars; marking or noting little things or precise details; very close or careful: as, minute observation.

These minute philosophers . . . plunder all who come in their way.

Berkley, Minute Philosopher, I.

If we wish to be very minute, we pronounce the i in the first syllable long.

Walker.

Bacon was fond of display, and unused to pay minute attention to domestic affairs.

Maccusley, Lord Bacon.

Minute anatomy. See anatomy. — Syn. 1. Little, diminutive, slender, fine. — 2. Circumstantial, Particular, Minute, exact, detailed. A circumstantial account gives the facts in detail; while circumstantial may include only the leading circumstances, a particular account gleams more closely, gathering all that are of any importance or interest; a minute account details even the slightest facts, perhaps those that are trivial and tedious.

minute² (mī-nūt'), n. and a. [< ME. minuta, mynute, mynet (in comp. also mynt-), a minute (of time), a moment (also a small piece of money). = MD. minute, D. minuut = G. minuten = Sw. Something very small; an unimportant particular; a petty detail; a trifle; specifically, a mite or half-farthing.

But whence a pore widens gas come, aube cast two minutia, that is, a farthing.

Wright, Mark xii. 42.

Let me hear from thee every minute of news.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, I. 2.

Curious of minutiae, and punctilious in rites and ceremonies, but most negligent and incurious of judgment and the love of God.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), I. 20.

2. The sixtieth part of any unit. Especially — (a) The sixtieth part of an hour; loosely, a short space of time.

Heavy degree of the burdened condition of a minute—that is to say, a minute of an hour.

For the increase
Of half a minute of an hour,
Pro first he began labour,
He lost all that he had do

Gower Conf Amant. iv

Nor all the pleasures there
Her mind could ever move one minute's stay to make Dryden Fables vi 33

(b) In geom., the sixtieth part of a degree of a circle. Division of units by sixtieths is the characteristic of the Babylonian system. Ptolemy, following the Babylonian astronomers, divides the diameter of the circle into 120 arcminutes or degrees, and these into sixty parts and these again into sixty parts. These subdivisions were translated into Latin as partes minuta prima and partes minuta secunda, whence our minutes (primes) and seconds. In modern astronomical works minutes of time are denoted by the initial letter m and minutes of a degree or of angular space by an acute accent ('). See degree, s.

After going by sea and by land toward this country of that I have spoke and to other Isles and Lands beyond that (country) I have founded the same Antarktyk of 34 degrees of height, and no mynutes

Maslelle Travels p 181

(c) In arch., the sixtieth part of the diameter of a column at the base, being a subdivision used for measuring the minor parts of an order. See module.

3 A written summary of an agreement or of a transaction, interview, or proceedings, a note to preserve the memory of anything usually in the plural. Specifically the minutes are the record of the proceedings at a meeting of a corporation, board, society, church, court, or other deliberative body, put in writing by its secretary or other recording officer.

When I came to my chambers I writ down these minutes
Shakspeare Hamlet, iv 4

Into all the duties he had to perform he brought what is better than Treasury minute or rule or precedent—a warm heart, a careful conscience, and a good head.

Westminster Rev. (1855) 9.

miophylly (mi'oh'fil'i), n. [Gr. μῑος, less, + φυλή, a leaf.] A diminution of the normal number of leaves in a whorl, due to actual suppression. It differs from abortion in the suppressed organs having never started to grow. Miophylly occurs also in the calyx, in the bract and gynoecium. Also spelled miophylla.

miosis (mi'oh'sis), n. [NL, < (Gr. μῑος, lessening, < μῑω, lessen, < μῑω, less irregular comparison of μῑω, small or few)] Diminution. Specifically (a) In bot. (1) A figure by which a thing is represented as less than it really is, as in blotting an opponent's statement affecting to show an accusation, etc. (2) Understatement so as to intensify especially, expression by negation of the opposite. (b) In pathol., that period of a disease in which the symptoms begin to diminish. Also miotic.

miostemonous (mi'oh'stem'oh'nous), a. [Gr. μῑος, less, + στέμον, for 'stamen' see stamen.] Having the stamens less in number than the petals; said of plants. Also miostemonous.

miotaxy (mi'oh'tak'si), n. [NL, < (Gr. μῑος, less, + τάξις, arrangement)] The suppression of an entire whorl of the members of any organ in a flower, as the sepals, petals, stamens, or styles. The androecium and gynoecium are most frequently suppressed producing male or female flowers exclusively as the case may be. Also spelled miotaxy.

miour, n. See miour.

mi-parti (mi'par'ti), a. [F. < mi (< L. medius), half, + parti, part, < part = medius and part.] 1 Of two colors and equally or nearly equally divided between them, as, mi-parti hose, of which one leg is of a different color from the other—2. In her., divided per pale half-way down the scutcheon, the partition-line being not at the lesser point by some other line, which must also be expressed in the blazon.

mir (mir'), n. [Russ. мир, union, concord, peace, also world, < (Bulg. mir, peace, world, < Ser. mir, peace, < Albanian mir, peace)] A Russian commune; a community of Russian peasants. The rural population of Russia has been from ancient times organized into mirs or local communities in which the land is held in common the plot of devoted cultivation being allotted by general vote. The several families for sowing terms the distribution and equalization of lots take place from time to time. If used as a household the property of the mir but usually remains for a long time under the same ownership. Mirs and forests are frequently appropriated and are generally common for grazing. Every mir in Russia is ruled by a council chosen from the high tax-paying families and the tax officers.

mirabily (mi'rab'ily), n. [Prop. mirabilis, q. v. see mirable.] A relation of wonders.

The use of this work is nothing less than to give contentment to the appetite of curiosity and vain wit, as the manner of the modern scholars is to do.

Lucan Advancement of Learning, II.

mirabile dictu (mi'rab'ily dik'tu), [L. mirabile, wonderful, dictu, abl. supine of dicere, say, see mirable and dictum.] Wonderful to relate.

mirabile visu (mi'rab'ily lô'vi sù), [L. mirabile, wonderful, visu, abl. supine of videre, see, see vision.] Wonderful to see.

mirabily (mi'rab'ily), a and n. [ML. mirabilis, a worker of wonders or miracle, < L. mirabilis, wonderful, see mirable.] 1 a Having to do with the working or the relation of wonders.

And we leave to you the title of Mirabily Miracle among us

Purchas His Image p 98

II. n A book in which wonderful things are noted, a treatise on miracles, portents, prodigies, omens, and the like.

Mirabilis (mi'rab'ily), n. [NL. (Chenop. 1849), < mirabile + -is.] A tribe of dicotyledonous upland plants of the natural order Urticaceae, the four o'clock family. The fruit is a utricle, surrounded by the base of the perianth which keeps on growing all a flowering the embryo is much curved with a distinct radicle. The tribe embraces 16 genera Mirabilis being the type, and about 112 species nearly all of which are confined to the western hemisphere.

Mirabilis (mi'rab'ily), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1757), < L. mirabilis, wonderful, see mirable.] A genus of uctaginaceous plants, type of the tribe Mirabilis. The flowers are surrounded by an involucrum of united bracts which remain unchanged after flowering the elongated perianth is rarely campanulate. They are much branched plants with opposite leaves, the lower ones petiolate and the upper sessile and with quite large often fragrant flowers with six white or red, or variegated and arranged in branching cymes. There are 10 or 12 species, natives of the warmer parts of America. M. Jalapa is the common four-o'clock or marvel of Peru. A few other species are somewhat cultivated. See afternoon-glories.

mirabilite (mir'ab'i-lit), n. [So named by Glauber to express his surprise at its artificial production; < L. mirabilis, wonderful (see mirable), + -ite.] A name given to the hydrous sulphate of sodium, or Glauber salt, occurring usually in a state of efflorescence about salt-springs. It is used as a substitute for soda in the manufacture of glass.

mirable (mir'ä-bl), a. [= OF. mirable = Sp. (obs.) mirable = Pg. miravel = It. mirabile, < L. mirabilis, wonderful, < mirari, wonder at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire. Cf. marvel, a. and n., ult. < L. mirabilis, wonderful.] Wonderful.

Not Neoptolemus so mirable,
On whose bright crest Fame with her loud st. Oyes Cries "This is he!" Shak., T. and C., iv. 3. 142.

mirabolane, mirabolant, n. See myrobolan.
miracle (mir'ä-kl), n. [ME. miracle, myracle, < OF. miracle, F. miracle = Pr. miracle = Sp. milagro = Pg. milagre = It. miracolo = D. (i), Dan. Sw. mirakel, < L. miraculum, a wonderful work, a miracle, a wonder, < mirari, wonder at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire.] 1. A wonder, or a wonderful thing; something that excites admiration or astonishment.

Be not offended, nature's miracle,
Thou art allotted to be ta'en by me.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 3. 64.

He has faults,
Belike, though he be such a miracle.
Shirley, Love's Cruelty, l. 1.

I have beheld the Ephraim's miracle —
Its columns strew the wilderness.
Byron, Child Harold, iv. 183.

How exquisitely minute,
A miracle of design!
Tennyson, Maud, xiv. 1.

2. An effect in nature not attributable to any of the recognized operations of nature nor to the act of man, but indicative of superhuman power, and serving as a sign or witness thereof; a wonderful work, manifesting a power superior to the ordinary forces of nature.

That Cyter tok Josue, he miracle of God and commandment of the Angel, and destroyed it and cursed it, and all hein that lyled it seen. Manderley, Travels, p. 98.

Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him. John iii. 2.

Miracles have been wrought to convert idolaters and the superstitious, because no light of nature extendeth to deceive the will and true worship of God.

Haem, Advancement of Learning, ii. 162.

To speak properly, there is not one miracle greater than another, they being the extraordinary effects of the hand of God, to which all things are of an equal facility.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 17.

A miracle may be accurately defined a transgression of a law of Nature by a particular volition of the Deity, or by the interposition of some invisible agent.

Hume, Human Understanding, Of Miracles, x. note.

What are miracles? They are the acts and manifestations of a Spiritual Power in the universe, superior to the powers and laws of matter. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 248.

The definition of a miracle as a violation of the laws of nature is, in reality, an employment of language which, in the face of the matter, cannot be justified.

Huxley, Hume, p. 120.

3. A miraculous story; a legend.
When said was at this miracle, every man
As sobre was, that wonder was to see.
Chaucer, Prologue to Sir Thomas, l. 1.

4. In the middle ages, one of a class of spectacles or dramatic representations exhibiting the lives of the saints or other sacred subjects; a miracle-play, somewhat resembling that still held at Oberammergau in Bavaria. Compare mystery, 4.

At marketts & miracles we medleth vs nevere.

Piers Plouman's Creed (E. E. T. S.), l. 107.

The theatrical exhibitions in London, in the twelfth century, were called Miracles, because they consisted of sacred plays, or representations of the miracles wrought by the holy confessors. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 227.

To a miracle, wonderfully; admirably; beyond conception: as, he did his part to a miracle.

miraclet (mir'ä-kl), v. [ME. miraclet; < miracle, n.] 1. intrans. To work wonders or miracles.

This is the 5. beygne of blood denyng, and marvels more than man may believe but if he see it.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 11.

II. trans. To make wonderful.
Who this should be,
Doth miracle itself, loved before me.

Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2. 23.

miracle-monger (mir'ä-kl-mung'gér), n. A wonder-worker; an impostor who pretends to work miracles.

These miracle-mongers have alarmed the world round about them to a discoment of their tricks.

South Works, III. xi.
miracle-play (mir'ä-kl-plä), n. See miracle, 4.

Their usual name was plays, miracle plays or miracles;
the term miracles not being employed in England. Yet their character is essentially that of the plays termed myrtaries in France. A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., l. 21.

miracle-worker (mir'ä-kl-wör'kér), n. One who works miracles; a thaumaturgist.

He was deeply displaced by the demand for miracles, and repelled the support which men were ready to give to a miracle-worker. Portugally Rev., N. 8., XIII. 134.

miraclet (mir'ä-klit), n. [miracle + -let.]
One who records miracles.

Hears the miraclet report it, who himself was an actor. Declaration of Popish Impostures (1608). (Nares.)

miraculizer (mi-rä-k'ü-liz), v. t. [L. miracu-lum, a miracle (see miracle), + -ize.] To represent as a miracle; attribute to supernatural power. Shafterbury.

miraculous (mi-rä-k'ü-lus), a. [F. miraculeux
= Sp. milagroso = Pg. milagroso, miraculoso =
It. miracoloso, < ML. miraculosus (in adv. miraculose), wonderful, < L. miraculum, a wonder, miracle: see miracle.] 1. Exceedingly surprising or wonderful; extraordinary; incomprehensible; as, a miraculous escape.

The invariable mark of wisdom is to see the miraculous in the common. Emerson, Nature.

2. Of the nature of a miracle; working miracles; performed by, involving, or exhibiting a power beyond the ordinary agency of natural laws; supernatural.

Behind the high altar they have what they call a miraculous picture of the virgin Mary, which, they say, was painted by St. Luke, but it is not to be seen.

Poecke, Description of the East, II. l. 133.
Generation after generation the province of the miraculous has contracted, and the circle of scepticism has expanded. Lecky, Rationalism, l. 104.

3. syn. 2. Preternatural, Supernatural, etc. See supernatural.

miraculously (mi-rä-k'ü-lus-ly), adv. In a miraculous manner; wonderfully; by extraordinary means; by means of a miracle; super-naturally.

Except the miraculously had been almost miraculously skillful in languages. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 47.

The sickness is miraculously decreased in this city, and suburbs. Hemell, Letters, l. iv. 23.

Some cheats have pretended to cure diseases miraculously. Porteus, Works, II. xiv.

miraculousness (mi-rä-k'ü-lus-ness), n. The quality of being miraculous.

mirador (mir-a-dör'), n.; pl. miradores (mir-a-dör'es). [Sp. (> Pg. mirador = F. miradore), < mirar, behold: see mirror, mirror.] A belvedere or gallery commanding an extensive view. See cut under belvedere.

Meantime your valiant son, who had before Gaid's fame, rode round to every mirador.
Drayton, Conquest of Granada, l. 111.

When he departed from the Alhambra, she betook herself to her mirador, overlooking the vega, whence she watched the army, as it went in shining order, along the road leading to Loxa. Irving, Granada, p. 107.

mirage (mi-räzh'), n. [F. mirage (= Pg. miragem = It. miraggio), < mirer, < ML. mirare, look at: see mirror.] 1. An optical illusion due to excessive bending of light-rays in traversing adjacent layers of air of widely different densities, whereby distorted, displaced, or inverted images are produced. The requisite change in density arises only near the earth's surface, and the hot shining of the sun seems to be an invariable antecedent. The mirage of the desert presents an appearance of objects reflected in a surface of water; in this case the heated earth warms the air in the lower strata faster than it can escape, and the density of the ground conduces to the maintenance of the resulting abnormal distribution of density. Displacement by mirage is commonly vertical, but is lateral when the density gradient is more or less inclined to the vertical. Looney, and fata Morgana are species of mirage. See these words.

Hence—2. Deceptiveness of appearance; a delusive seeming; an illusion.

The poetry which had preceded him [Chaucer] . . . at last had well nigh lost itself in chasing the mirage of allegory. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 126.

mirbane (mër'bän), n. A fanciful name under which nitrobenzol is sold as oil of mirbane or essence of mirbane.

mirre (mir), n. [ME. mirre, myrr, < Heb. myrr, later myrr = Norw. myrr = Sw. Dan. myrr, a bog, swamp, = OHG. mior, MHG. G. mior, a bog, swamp, also moss (a plant), = AS. mior, moss (a plant): see moss, moss.] 1. Wet; slimy soil of some depth and of yielding consistence; deep mud.

He [the parson] sette not his benefice to hyre,
And lost his schep encombred in the mirre.
Chaucer, Gen. Prologue to C. T. (ed. Morris), l. 608.
I sink in deep mirre, where there is no standing.
Pa. Litr. 2.

2. Filth. — Dan in the mirre. See dun.
mirre (mir), v.; pret. and pp. mired, ppr. miring.
[< mirre, n.] 1. trans. 1. To plunge and fix in mirre; set or stall in mud; sink in mud or in a morass.

Nor do I believe that there is a single instance of a skeleton of one of the extinct mammals having been found in an upright position, as if it had been saved.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, II. 351.

2. To soil or daub with slimy mud or foul matter.

Smirch'd thus, and mired with infamy.
Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1. 136.

Harpos miring every dish. Tennyson, Lancelot.

II. intrans. To sink in mud; especially, to sink so deep as to be unable to move forward;
stick in the mud.

Paint till a horse may mirre upon your face.
Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 147.

mirre (mir), n. [ME. mirre, also myrr (not in AS.), < Heb. myrr = Sw. myrr = Dan. myrr = D. mirre, mir = MLat. mir (> G. mirre), an ant; cf. Ir. morbh, W. mor (grugyn) = *Corn.
murrian* (pl.); < Bulg. mrazja = Serv. mraz = vri*; < Gr. μύρρις, myrris; < F. formica (f) (> F. fourmi); < Peru. mir, Zend. mairi, ant; an ancient Indo-Eur. designation of the insect, superseded in E. by the merely Teut. ant.] An ant. See pinworm.

mirre (mir), v. t. [L. mirari, wonder: see admire, mirror.] To wonder; admire.

He mirred what course may be warily taken.
Southey, Anecd. II. 232.

Mirecourt lace. See lace.

mire-crow (mir'krö), n. The sea-crow, laughing-gull, or pewit-gull. [Local, Eng.]

mire-drum (mir'drum), n. [In earlier form mire-drumble, q. v.; so called from its cry, and from haunting miry places.] A bittern.

mire-drumble (mir'drum'bl), n. [Early mod.
F. myrdromble, < ME. myre-drombylle, -dromyille,
-drommylle, -drommyl; < mirre + drumbl.] Same as mire-drum.

Ula is a byrde of the quantyte of a crowe sprong wyth speckes and ptychth hya bylle in to a myre place and makyth a grette sowne and noyse, and herby it semyth that ula is a myre drumble.
Glossed, quoted in Cath. Ang., p. 260.

mire-duck (mir'duk), n. The common duck;
the puddle-duck. See duck, 2.

miriadet, n. An obsolete form of myriad.

Miridae (mir'i-dé), n. pl. [NL. (Douglas and Scott, 1865), < Miris + -idae.] A family of haemopterous insects of the section Carpina, containing Miris and two other genera, and of wide distribution. The body is linear-elongate with subparal-lel sides, the head horizontal, clypeus very convex, pronotum trapezoidal, femora sometimes tufted beneath, and antennae of variable length.

mirific (mir'rif'ik), a. [= F. mirifique = Sp. mi-rifico = Pg. It. mirifico, < L. mirificus, causing wonder or admiration, extraordinary, < mirus, wonderful + facere, make.] Wonder-working;
wonderful.

More numerous, wonder-working, and mirific.
Cypriote, tr. of Babelais, III. 4. (Dumas.)

mirificat (mir'rif'ik-ä), a. [mirific + -at.] Same as mirific.

mirificent (mir'rif'ik-sent), a. [LL. as if mirif-icew (t) (in deriv. LL. mirificentia), < L. mirus, wonderful + facere, make. Cf. mirific.] Causing wonder. [Rare.]

Enchantment Agrippa defines to be nothing but the convergence of a certain mirificent power into the thing enchanted. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Iniquity, I. xviii. 34 (Long, 344.)

mirriness (mir'ri-ness), n. The state of being miry, or covered with deep mud.

Mirids (mir'ids), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1803); etym. dubious.] The typical genus of Miridae. Between 20 and 30 species are known, mainly European; 6 are North American, as M. dorsalis.

mirish (mir'ish), a. [< miral + -ish]. Miry.

miri-ti-palm (mir'i-ti-pām), n. Same as ih-palm.

mirk, mirkily, etc. See murk, etc.

mirligoes, n. See merligoes.

miro (mē'ro), n. [Native name.] A New Zealand coniferous tree, Podocarpus ferrugineus, called black pine by the colonists. It yields a hard brown timber suitable for turnery, cabinet-making, and civil architecture.

mirro, n. A Middle English form of myrrh.

mirror (mir'or), n. [Early mod. E. also mir-sour, myrrour; < ME. mirroure, myrrour, myrroure, myroure, mirour, < OF. mirroir, mirour, mirur, F. mirroir = Pr. mirador = It. miratore, miradore, a looking-glass (= Sp. mirador, a look-out, balcony; see mirador), < ML. as if miratorium*, < L. mirari, wonder at, ML. mirare (> It. mirare = Sp. Pg. mirar = F. mirer), look at, < mirus, wonderful; see admirer, miracle.] 1.

A polished surface, as of metal, or of glass backed by a metal or other opaque substance, used to reflect objects, especially to reflect the face or person as an aid in making the toilet.

The mirrors of the ancients were of polished metal, as are those of the Japanese and some other Oriental nations.

Glass mirrors, consisting of transparent glass with a backing of metal to act as the reflecting surface, did not become common until the sixteenth century.

Mirrors have been used for decoration of the person, being sewed to the material of the dress and serving as larger and more brilliant ornaments; they have also been used in the interior decoration of buildings, especially in Persia and the East Indies. (Compare arish.) The common method of preparing glass mirrors is to coat one side of the glass with an amalgam of tin and mercury (called silvering), but mirrors are now often made by depositing pure silver on the glass.

Now in this mirror look you see;

In yowre face wille the choyce lye

To heuen or helle whither ye wille go.

Humans to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 78.

In this mirror she shall see

Her self as much transform'd as me.

Congress, Semole, III. 3.

2. Specifically, in optics, a surface of glass or polished substance that forms images by the reflection of rays of light; a speculum. Optical mirrors are plane, convex, or concave. A plane mirror gives a virtual image whose apparent position is on the opposite side of the mirror from the reflected body and at an equal distance from it. A concave spherical mirror (supposing that it includes only a small part of a large spherical surface) reflects rays parallel to its axis, as those from the sun, to a point (F in fig. 1) called the principal focus, whose distance from the mirror is equal to half the radius of the sphere.

of which the surface of the mirror forms a part. Rays proceeding from a luminous point upon the axis beyond the center (L in fig. 2) are reflected to a focus, F, between the center and F; and these two points are called conjugate foci, since they are interchangeable; a luminous body at L has a real inverted and diminished image formed at F. If, however, the luminous body be at F, the image is formed at L, also real and inverted, but magnified. If the luminous body is at P, the principal focus, the reflected rays are sent out in parallel lines; if nearer the mirror than F, the rays after reflection are divergent, and the image is virtual, erect, and magnified. In a convex spherical mirror parallel rays are brought exactly to a focus at the geometrical focus; hence this form is suitable for reflectors, as in the headlight of a locomotive. The images formed by convex mirrors are always virtual and smaller than the object.

3. Figuratively, that in or by which anything is shown or exemplified; hence, a pattern; an exemplar.

That book [the Koran] saythe also that Jesu was sent from God alle myghte for to ben Myrrour and Ensample and Tokene alle men.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 123.

How farrest thou, mirror of all martial men?

Shak., I Hen. VI., l. 4. 74.

4. In arch., a small oval ornament surrounded by a concave molding; a simple form of cartouche.—5. In ornith., same as speculum.—Archimedeus mirror, a mirror intended for burning an enemy's ships or buildings; proposed or carried more than once in the middle ages, in imitation of the mirrors mentioned by Lucian as used by Archimedes. Green, MIL. ART., II. 107.—Axis of a spherical, concave, or convex mirror. See axis.—Claude Lorrain mirror, a blackened convex glass designed to show the effect of a landscape reflected in somewhat exaggerated perspective; so called from the fancied similarity of its effects to the pictures of Claude Lorrain (1600-82), a landscape painter celebrated for his rendering of sunlight and shadow and light-effects in general. Also called Claude glass.—Conjugate mirrors. See conjugate.—Cylindrical mirror. See cylindrical.—Easel-mirror, a small mirror having a prop or foot fastened to the back of it by a hinge so that, at pleasure, the mirror may be set up on one edge.—Magic mirror. (a) A mirror in which, in various systems of fortune-telling or divination, a person was supposed to see reflected scenes in his future life, or an answer to some question. (b) A Japanese mirror of cast metal, which, when made to reflect the sun's rays upon a screen at a proper distance, shows in the reflection bright images which are counterparts of raised figures or characters on the back of the mirror. These, like all Japanese mirrors, are generally circular in form, are about one eighth of an inch thick in the thinnest part, and are usually surrounded on the back by a raised rim. The surface of the mirror is generally slightly convex, and coated with an amalgam of mercury and the metal forming the mirror. The surface is locally modified in its curvature by the characters, either by the shrinkage of the metal in cooling, or by its deformation in the process of amalgamation or of polishing. Only a few of the mirrors which apparently answer to the general description in respect to their construction possess the "magic" property in any great degree. Boomerang's mirror, in microscopy, a plane mirror of polished steel, smaller than the pupil of the eye, placed before the eyepiece of the microscope to be used like the camera lucida in making drawings.

mirro (mir'or), v. t. [< mirror, n.] To reflect in or as in a mirror.

Bending to her open eyes,

Where he was mirror'd small in paradise.

Keats, Lamia, II.

Pictorial . . . more than any other branch of literature mirrors the popular philosophy of the hour.

Contemporary Rec., XLIX. 580.

mirror-black (mir'or-blak), a. An epithet applied to any ceramic ware having a lustrous black glaze, especially a rare and highly esteemed Japanese stoneware of ancient manufacture.

mirror-carp (mir'or-kārp), n. A variety of the common carp, Cyprinus carpio, in which the skin is mostly naked, but has patches of very large scales on the back and also above the anal fin, and on the tail and the posterior part of the lateral line. It is the result of artificial selection and domestication, and is regarded as a better table-fish than the ordinary carp. See cut under carp.

mirror-galvanometer (mir'or-gal-vā-nom'ē-ter), n. A galvanometer with a mirror attached to the needle which reflects a beam of light intercepted by a scale of equal parts. The spot of light on the scale serves as an index.—Thomson's mirror-galvanometer. See galvanometer.

mirror-script (mir'or-skript), n. Writing as seen (reversed) in a mirror. Such writing is characteristic of a certain form of aphasia.

mirror-stonet (mir'or-stōn), n. Muscovite; so called because it "represents the image of that which is set behind it." E. Phillips, 1706.

mirror-writer (mir'or-rī'ter), n. One who writes mirror-script.

Mirror writers, it would appear, if they did not "live before Adam," lived not very long after him; for the first seven letters of that chieftain's name are so written in an inscription in the Louvre (Hall of Phyllas, 60).

York Plays, p. 180.

2. A state or feeling of merriment; demonstrative gaiety; jollity; hilarity.

So merrill mirth gan with thaim mete

Of nobill noyse and sauntre swete.

Holy Hood (E. E. T. S.), p. 16.

Present mirth hath present laughter.

Shak., T. N., II. 3. 49.

Great was the mirth in the kitchen,

Likewise in the hall.

Karl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 276).

3. A cause or subject of merriment; that which excites gaiety or laughter. [Rare.]

Fayn wolde I don yow mirth, wile I how,

To don you see, and it shal come nought.

Chaucer, Prolog. to C. T., l. 767.

He's all my exercise, my mirth, my matter.

Shak., W. T., I. 2. 106.

—Syn. Mirth, Cheerfulness.

I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth. The latter I consider as an act, the former as a habit, of the mind.
